In one of these cases the decision on the facts involved and the language of the court show that our courts would not have upheld such abuse as that in West Virginia. The case to which I refer is Jones v. Seward, 40 Barbour, 563. Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, acting under the authority of President Lincoln, had Jones, who had been our Minister to Colombia under President Buchanan, imprisoned in a military court when he arrived in New York in 1863. Jones sued Seward for damages for false imprisonment, and Secretary Seward tried to have the case transferred to the Federal courts on the ground that the Constitution of the United States was involved. The New York Supreme Court declined to allow its removal, for the Judge said that such an act was absolutely without right beyond any question. He also gave an example which exactly covers the West Virginia case. The extreme abuse in West Virginia to which Judge Cullen calls attention is that "Jones and others were arrested outside a military zone by civil authorities and then turned over to the military commission for trial." The court, in Jones v. Seward, writing while the civil war was going on, said:

> General Rosecrans had a right, I have no doubt, the other day, to destroy all property which caused any obstacles to his operations against Bragg; and if he discovered any plots to mar those operations or to give intelligence to the enemy, or to afford them any kind of aid or comfort, he would have a right to try the offenders, whether civilians or soldiers, by a court-martial. But his power does not extend beyond his lines. If a man at Cincinnati has a correspondence with Bragg, giving him intelligence of the plans of Rosecrans, the latter cannot have the offender arrested at Cincinnati, brought within his lines, and tried by a court-martial. This man is, indeed, emphatically a traitor; he is guilty of high treason against the United States of America; but he is to be tried by a civil tribunal, according to the course and practice of the established law, on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury.

What Rosstrappe Means.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Referring to Mr. Pennrich's etymology of "Rosstrappe," it might just as well mean "horse trap," or simply "horse rock," as "Trappe" is quite common in Germany for "rock," more particularly for what geologists here call "trap" and laymen "trap rock." It is also used for "step;" witness the Sieben Trappen near Hannover.

ALL SOULS' NIGHT.

The moon shows dim across the grass.
I seem to see a shadow pass!
Is it but fancy? Do I hear
A sigh from out the stillness clear?
'Tis Halloween!

A faint tap on my window pane—
The lattice stirs! Again—again!
If some soul stays for welcoming,
Why should I fear to let it in
On Halloween?

Heart's dearest, do you wait outside?
Look! I have thrown the casement wide,
Straining my tear-wet eyes to see!
God, let my dead come back to me—
This Halloween!

HOW A GERMAN SWALLOWS HIS HEART.

He May Love a Thing, as He Loves France, and Yet if Need Be Destroy It, With Exclamations of Sincere Pity.

By PROFESSOR R. J. OBERFOHREN.

New York, Oct. 29, 1915.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Time and again newspaper editors and correspondents have tried to denounce Teuton hypocrisy by calling attention to the fact that German statesmen and writers have given expression to feelings of compassion with the fate of several nations actually at war with Germany. Particularly scornful comment has been poured out on a reported utterance of the Kaiser concerning the unhappy fate of France. It could fairly be questioned if the Kaiser's words have been exactly reported; his feelings are certainly shared by a great many Germans, and it is very significant that even supposed neutrals are unable to understand the state of mind out of which such compassion for a suffering foe is born.

More than eighty years ago, Heine, in one of his letters, said that every German bears in his heart a secret love for France. French culture and civilization have always had a powerful influence upon and a great attraction for Germany. French is the one modern language that is obligatory in all German high schools. It is the ambition of every young German, man or woman, to live for a time in France or French-speaking Switzerland; and I fear no challenge if I say that, outside of France, Belgium, and Switzerland, there is no country where the French language is so widely understood and French books read as in Germany. Consequently, French literature is widely appreciated in Germany, and every boy and girl has read at least a few of the masterpieces of French literature in the original. Though Molière has not now a place on the German stage that could be compared with Shakespeare's, this is perhaps due to the lack of an adequate translation, and such a translation has not been produced because there was no absolute necessity for it, the majority of Germans being able to understand the original.

It is not so long ago that the great Belgian poet, Emile Verhaeren, published a new volume of his poems in Germany, (Inselverlag, Leipzig;) not a translation, I emphasize, but the original French text of a first edition, which was published by a German publisher. Verhaeren's reputation being such that any Belgian or French publisher would gladly accepted his poems, the reason for this extraordinary act can only be found in the poet's convictions that his work would find better appreciation in Germany, where, indeed, he has a large circle of admirers. En passant, it may be mentioned that the fame of Maeterlinck, the other great Belgian poet, originated in Germany. Unlike England and other countries, Germany has never contented herself with importing every year from France the newest theatrical boulevard success or the latest "triangular" French novel, but has endeavored to penetrate to the core of the French literature and to assimilate the best.

The same fact can be observed in science as well as in the painter's and sculptor's arts. The impressionism was born in France, but soon found masterful representatives on the other side of the Vosges; and a similar process seems to be going on in our time in regard to cubism, futurism, and other new forms of art. Of course in all these matters it has not been a one-sided bargain, where Germany was the only winning side, but an act of give and take. However, I leave it to a competent and fair-minded Frenchman to state what France's intellectual, musical, and artistic life owes to Germany.

Although in the bitterness of the present hour Frenchmen may be inclined to deny it, the fact is that many high and public-spirited men in both countries thought it advisable and feasible to bring Teuton and Frenchman in closer relation, to unite German force and organization to French élan and spirit. I will not venture upon the political field, but the best French writers have frequently given expression to this thought. As an instance, I refer to the most important book, or series of books, that French art has produced within the last decade, "Jean Christophe," by Romain Rolland, that wonderful book which has been the delight of untold readers. The hero of this novel, which, by the way, was crowned by the Académie Française, is a musician who was born in Germany and lived there to the age of 20, thus passing the important years of development in the country of Bach, Beethoven, and Wagner. Then a sudden turn in life brings him to Paris, where he assimilates all the good he can find, uniting himself in a close friendship with a young, intellectual Frenchman, a friendship in which the characters of the two friends complete and fashion each other. The young musician so thoroughly assimilates the French life, art, and culture that he becomes a perfect specimen of the perfect type of man which would be the fruit of the union of French and German spirit.

To return to the point from which I started, there is still another matter which has to be dwelt upon in order to explain the sincerity of a German's concern about France. That is the singular objectivity which is a characteristic trait of the German mind.

Countless articles and books have been written about German efficiency, organization, and the necessity for other countries to imitate it. Yet the fundamental basis of this peculiar German faculty of organization has almost been constantly overlooked. It is just this excuse of objectivity (Sachlichkeit is the German expression). To develop anything, be it an idea, a business, an invention, an administration, to perfection, it is necessary to detach from it every personal interest, be it money, fame or what it may, to have nothing in mind and to look for nothing but the thing in question. To face an object without any personal thoughts requires a kind of divesting of the personality; it needs a high standard of intellectual culture to enable a man to lay aside the spectacles of passion and self-interest. It is an application of the "Ding an sich" (the thing per se) that has been a crux to many foreign students of German philosophy. This objective way of thinking is strongly fostered in Germany's classic schools.

With just the same dispassionate eyes the German looks upon France and her lamentable fate. He sees a gifted and brave nation dragged into the war by her friends and allies; fortune of war turns against her and the inevitable miseries and sufferings that form the trail of war lie heavily upon a fair country. Knowledge of human nature, moreover, makes him understand that in the heart of the conquered forty-five years ago is still alive a fire of revenge. The same fire burned in Germany more than a century ago. That a stern necessity has forced him to oppose this revenge in order to protect his own hearth cannot blind the German's objectivity. He looks at the thing itself without bringing into play his own personal interests and passions. It is not hypocrisy, but the deepest compassion born out of detachment and understanding when the highest representative of warring Germany says: "I pity France."

It would be well for all the simple-minded souls who have expressed their indignation at Teuton impudence if they would try to understand this state of mind which I have called objectivity. It would bring them to a better conception of neutrality, and moreover would greatly benefit them in what is called German organization and efficiency. But by using the word "benefit" I already make a contradiction in terms—yet I will leave it here.

MR. PINCHOT'S ISSUE.

That Is Whether the Constitution Will Tend to Destroy Democracy.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

There has been a great deal of discussion of our differences of opinion in regard to the various provisions of the new Constitution. But very little has been said about the two opposed ideas of government represented by the advocates and enemies of the proposed fundamental law.

Nevertheless, as it seems to me, we are divided into two opposite and distinct camps: Those who think that administrative efficiency is the highest necessity of government, and those who believe that democracy is the first and main thing, and that even efficiency must be sacrificed to some extent, if it is obtainable only at a substantial loss to democracy.

The proposed Constitution places enormous control in the hands of the Executive. Its framers no doubt sincerely believe that this is necessary in order to have competent administration. And to them, the fact that this concentration of power in the Executive is accompanied by corresponding loss of power in the legislative branch, does not seem a serious drawback.

The opponents of the new Constitution, on the other hand, believe that the Legislature, which, with all its faults, is the direct representative of the public, should not relinquish any of its power. They say that, even if it means less efficiency, the people should still keep at least as much power as they now have. They say it is better even to have power ill-used by the people than to have it better used by a branch of the Government that is more or less remote from them. They admit that democracy, at least until it has achieved a high degree of development, is not in theory the most effective method of government from an administrative point of view. But they insist that the only way for the people to learn to govern is to keep on governing, to make their own mistakes and learn by them, and gradually, by an increased appreciation of the necessity of doing things well, develop a high degree of efficiency as well as democracy—but democracy always comes first.

Since the time of the Stuart Kings, the struggle for liberty in English-speaking peoples has always been centred in a fight for power between the executive and the legislative branches. This is true today, and the present difference of opinion over the proposed Constitution in this State is at bottom merely the last phase of that eternal struggle.

If the framers of the proposed Constitution, who, by the way, have been led by men of a purely executive type of mind, had been willing to compromise—if they had accompanied increased executive control with such checks and balances as would have left the distribution of power between the legislative and the executive branches unchanged—there would have been no clear issue, such as there is today. The Constitution would be voted up or down largely on the question whether it did or did not make for efficiency. But this issue is now subordinated. In its place is the larger question, whether the new Constitution tends to preserve or destroy democracy.

AN ACTOR'S YEARNING.

Who Will Give Film Players Their Chance in the Legitimate?

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The letter signed "H. B. A.," captioned "Movies or Art," is most timely. By all means "let us rush to the aid of the hard-pressed spoken drama, the finest of fine arts."

William A. Brady, whose speech at the Friars' banquet in his honor inspired "H. B. A.'s" letter, is, I hope, sincere in his plea. If so, he is in a position to accomplish much. Mr. Brady, however, bewails the dearth of good young actors, and continues: "Where will you find a Booth, a Barrett, a Fanny Davenport, a Clara Morris, on our stage today?" The actor will die out, because the movies offer inducements and the drama doesn't. I find that where ten years ago there were twenty young men ambitious for a stage career, today there is not one."

Has Mr. Brady considered, I wonder, that there may be many young actors who have proved their worth, but who, because of lack of opportunities in New York to display their talents, or lack of the ability to push themselves, which so many acknowledged bad actors seem to possess, have been forced into acting for the camera, and who would gladly accept less remuneration to play in the theatre? I could without hesitation name half a dozen such.

Will Mr. Brady make his name immortal in the theatre by giving some of these their opportunity, and perhaps unearthing a worthy successor to Booth, Barrett, &c.? I wonder. Surely histrionic genius is not dead.

Cash or Credit.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In his letter in The Times today, Mr. Landon loses sight of the vital question to be decided by the canal referendum. The people of the State decided in 1903 to enlarge the State canals to barge canal dimensions at a cost estimated to be $101,000,000. The cost of construction has not exceeded the estimate, but unforeseen claims sustained by the courts have imposed upon the State an indebtedness of about $17,000,000, the payment of which the State cannot escape. Part of the $101,000,000 had to be used to pay so much of such claims as the courts awarded, and these payments diminished the money available for the construction work.

After expending $127,000,000 for the canals and the terminals the State will not be so unwise as to stop there and allow that sum to be wasted, and the $10,000,000 needed to finish the work must be provided as well as the $17,000,000 for which the State is obligated.

It is a business question purely which is now submitted. Shall the State pay cash or give its notes? If the canal referendum is approved it will give notes and spread payments over thirty to fifty years. If the referendum is defeated then it will pay cash, and the $27,000,000 will be added to the tax levy in the next two or three years. There is no escape from payment, and the voters on Tuesday must decide whether they will pay cash or take time. A vote for the referendum is for time; a vote against is for cash payment.

Miss Eleanor Bartlett Married to Carter Phelps by the Rev. S. De Lancey Townsend.

SISTER IS HONOR MATRON

Eight Bridesmaids in Frocks of Yellow Satin and Tulle—Ushers Are Yale Classmates of Bridegroom.

The wedding of Carter Phelps, a son of Mr. and Mrs. George B. Phelps, and Miss Eleanor Bartlett, younger daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Pomeroy Bartlett, was celebrated at 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon in All Angels' Church, Eighty-first Street and West End Avenue, the Rev. S. De Lancey Townsend performed the ceremony. Vases of pink and white chrysanthemums and oak foliage decorated the altar.

The bride, who walked with her father, wore a short skirted frock of white satin, the satin falling in irregular fluted points over a triple petticoat of white chiffon. The very long court train of white satin was suspended from the shoulders and over the full tulle veil fell one of rose point worn by the bride's mother and sister at their weddings. The low cut corsage was draped with point lace. She carried an arm bouquet of white orchids.

The matron of honor was the bride's sister, Mrs. Robert J. McArdle of Havana, Cuba. She was in palest gray satin trimmed in silver and wore an overdress of gray tulle, and wore a silver lace hat trimmed with shaded gray ostrich plumes and carried a sheaf of yellow chrysanthemums.

The eight bridesmaids were the Misses Anna and Frances Ballard, stepsisters of the bridegroom; Jane L. Fassett of Elmira, Rosamond Starr of Easton, Md., Alice Gertrude Gordon of Washington, D. C., Virginia Geddes, Ina Mayce, and Doris Nevin, a daughter of Ethelbert Nevin, all of this city. Their unusually smart frocks were of yellow satin and tulle, the skirt very short and full, but clinging closely. The low tulle bodices had cap sleeves to match edged with silver. Narrow silver ribbons crossed the back at the waist line and ran down into a wider sash of silver cloth wound about the slender hips and held in the centre front with a silver buckle, from which fell the ends, terminating in silver tassels. Over this was a straight coat body of unlined tulle with long sleeves finished at the wrists with gray fur; this straight bodice terminated under the sash. It was finished at the throat with a flat collar of gray fur.

From the silver girdles fell extremely full gray tulle overskirts finished in a full flare below the knees and bordered with a triple box ruche of the tulle through which ran silver ribbon tied at intervals in lovers' knots. Their gray tulle picture hats had silver frame work, and at the side were paddle-shaped ornaments of silver lace. Instead of flowers they carried little barrel muffs of gray tulle edged with gray fur.

The best man—Kenneth H. Clapp of Washington, D. C.—and the nine ushers were all classmates at Yale of Mr. Phelps, in the class of 1914. The latter were James Hallam Boyd of Washington, D. C.; Geoffery Tower of Philadelphia, Henry Blair Keep of Chicago, Albert Edwin Whitehill of Newburg, N. Y.; John C. Goodlett of Kansas City; John Gerish Beausher, James M. Howard, and Laurence M. Marks, all of New York, and Wallace Dale Holden.

The ceremony was followed by a reception at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Bartlett, 257 West Eighty-sixth Street. Mrs. Bartlett, who helped receive, wore a black net gown embroidered in gold and a hat to match. On their return from their wedding trip Mr. and Mrs. Phelps will live at 350 West End Avenue.

Mr. Phelps is a grandson of the late Oliver S. Phelps, the President of the First National Bank.

SOCIETY'S NEW FAD TO BE ICE SKATING

Tired of Dancing Craze, Women Form Secours National Club for Benefit of War Fugitives.

Ice skating promises to become the fad of the season for society, which has grown tired of the dancing craze.

A skating club composed of well-known society women is to be formed, which will meet at the Hotel Biltmore, where an outdoor rink is to be inaugurated shortly. The organization is to be known as the Secours National Skating Club, and the proceeds are to be devoted to the relief of French women and children and Belgian refugees, also the Lafayette Fund, which looks after the immediate relief of the men in the trenches.

The offices of the club are at 16 East Forty-seventh Street, and the meetings are to be held on Tuesdays and Thursdays, from 4 to 7 o'clock, for three months, beginning in December. There will be two classes of membership, single and family, the first costing $20, the second $35.

On other days the skating pond is to be open for the hotel guests and the public, and it is expected that the work will be completed by Dec. 1. The rink will be in the Italian Gardens, two stories above the ground floor, and the pond will be 60 by 75 feet, edged with pine trees. On a terrace overlooking the pond there will be a tearoom, heated and inclosed in glass. The ice for the rink will be frozen by the hotel's ice plant.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER DIES IN HIS 95TH YEAR

Former Prime Minister of Canada Succumbs at His Home in England.

BEGAN LIFE AS A COBBLER

An Early Romance Was the Foundation of His Notable Career as a Statesman.

OTTAWA, Ontario, Oct. 30 — Sir Charles Tupper, the venerable Canadian statesman and former Prime Minister of Canada, died in England today in his ninety-fifth year. The news of his death came in a cablegram from Sir George Perley, Canadian High Commissioner in London, to Sir Robert Borden, the Premier.

Sir Charles's death occurred at his home, Broomwood, in Bexley Heath, Kent, and the official cablegram read: "Sir Charles Tupper died peacefully this morning."

Charles Stuart Tupper of Winnipeg, son of the late James Stuart Tupper and grandson of Sir Charles, succeeds to the baronetcy. He is a son-in-law of Dr. Charles Morse, Registrar of the Exchequer Court of Ottawa, and is about to leave for the front, having obtained a commission in the Cameronian Highlanders.

Starting life as a cobbler and ending by occupying the highest offices in the land, Sir Charles's career was one of the most remarkable of any man in public life. At the time of his retirement in 1900 he had served Canada for forty-five years, always in important positions, and was known as "the Grand Old Man of Canada."

Sir Charles Tupper was born in Amherst, Nova Scotia, and after receiving a meagre education in the schools of his home town, was apprenticed to a cobbler. His apprenticeship served, he set up in business for himself, and it is said that he was a good cobbler. Ambition was the mainspring of his existence in his earliest days, as well as when he became great, and he set about improving his mind by study and reading, with the hope of becoming a physician.

His father was too poor to assist him, but he became the protégé of a wealthy woman who lived near Amherst, and who sent him to Edinburgh University in Scotland, from which he obtained his degree in medicine. It is said that his adoption by her was a romance. Sir Charles is said to have won her love—she was some years his senior—and that she defrayed the expenses of his university education on the understanding that when he obtained his diploma he would return to Nova Scotia and their marriage would take place. When he returned he found her in bed charge of his mind, and the woman died a spinster.

Sir Charles immediately became successful as a physician, and while yet in his twenties was one of the foremost in Nova Scotia. This career, however, was too cramped for his ambitions, and in 1855 he exchanged into politics and defeated Joseph Howe, leader of the Liberals in his Province, winning his seat in the Nova Scotia Parliament as a Conservative.

His rise was rapid, and he soon became the leader in Parliament, to which he was returned fourteen consecutive times, and in 1864 became Premier of Nova Scotia. Canada then was composed of a number of independent States, and he was still Premier when the Confederation which resulted in the present Dominion of Canada was formed in 1867. At the time of his death he was the last of those who took part in the formation of the Dominion.

Sir Charles then became Minister of Customs in the Cabinet of Sir John Macdonald, and remained in that position until 1873, when the Conservative Party was defeated and went out of office. For the next five years he was Sir John's closest adviser, and when the party returned to power in 1878 Sir Charles became Minister of Public Works.

One of his most noteworthy achievements was the formation of the Department of Railways and Canals, of which he became the first Minister. In this post he carried out the policy of the Government for the enlargement of the Welland Canal, the deepening of the St. Lawrence River, the improvement of the Intercolonial Railway, and the construction by a private company of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

As Minister of Railways and Canals it was his duty to secure the passage of the Canadian Pacific Railway bill, which practically assured the construction of the road. During the House of Commons' session of 1880-81 he fought a bitter fight and won a great victory over great odds. The opponents of the Government tried to block the bill at every step, and affected painful solicitude over a young and struggling country being ruined by the mad project he was fathering. Nevertheless, always undaunted, Sir Charles fought every inch of the way and the bill became a law, with the result that the Canadian Pacific was built, and proved to be the greatest step in the development of the Dominion.

Sir Charles was knighted in 1879, and in 1883 was said to be by far the ablest member of the Canadian Ministry. His versatility was wonderful, and one striking instance of this was given when he suddenly became a rabid protectionist. In 1875 it was announced that the Mackenzie Reform Ministry had decided to adopt a policy of protection to native industries, and Sir Charles prepared an elaborate free trade speech in anticipation of a change in Governmental policy. Then, to his surprise, the Government announced that it was going to stick to the policy of tariff for revenue only. Sir Charles immediately assumed the rôle of an earnest protectionist, and denounced the Ministry for refusing to protect "our struggling industries." From then protection became his watchword, and brought his party back into power in 1878.

In 1884 Sir Charles retired from the Ministry and was appointed High Commissioner for Canada in London, from which he was recalled in 1887 to become Minister of Finance in Macdonald's new Cabinet. The following year, however, he resigned and returned to his London post, where he remained until 1896. During this time, in 1893, as one of the British Commissioners, he arranged a treaty between France and Canada. In 1887 and 1888 he was one of Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries on the Fishery Commission in Washington, D. C., and is said to have served with distinction and profit to the Dominion. He was made a baronet for his work on this occasion.

Sir Charles received many honors. He was made a Companion of the Bath at the Confederation; a Knight Commander of the Order of St. Michael and St. George in 1886; a Knight of the Grand Cross of St. Michael and St. George, and had received the University degrees of M.A., D.C.L. and LL.D.

In 1896 Sir Charles entered the Cabinet of Sir Mackenzie Bowell as Secretary of State and leader in the House of Commons, and when Bowell retired four months later succeeded him as Prime Minister. Until he retired in 1900 he was leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons. Several years ago Sir Charles went to England to spend the remaining years of his life, and his leave-taking was made the occasion of a great popular demonstration in Vancouver.

In addition to his other honors, Sir Charles was a former President of the Canadian Medical Association and a Governor of Dalhousie College in Nova Scotia. He was a member of the Manitoba Club of Winnipeg and the British Empire and Colonial Clubs of London, England.

He married Miss Frances Morse of Amherst and was the father of Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, a former Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, who was created a Knight in 1893.

BARON WELBY DEAD.

Financier Who Practically Controlled Affairs in England for Years.

LONDON, Oct. 30.—Baron Welby, (Reginald Earle Welby,) who was long prominent in financial circles, died yesterday at Malwood.

Reginald Earle Welby, First Baron, was elevated to the peerage in 1894. He was 83 years old. He entered the Treasury in 1856, became Assistant Financial Secretary to the Treasury in 1880, Auditor of the Civil List in 1881, and Permanent Secretary of the Treasury in 1885, holding this position until 1894. He left no heir.

He was born in Hoxton, Leicester, and was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. Among the honors he had received were the appointment as Privy Councillor, and he was a Knight of the Grand Cross of the Bath, a Knight Commander of the Bath, and a Companion of the Bath. He was a former Alderman and Chairman of the London County Council, and established the existing methods of financing that city. For nearly twenty years he practically controlled the financial affairs of England.

In 1906, during the Administration of President Roosevelt, he commented on a message of the President and gave his ideas of the proper methods of reorganizing the currency of the United States.

"There seems to be a general agreement," he said "that your currency system has proved inadequate and various legislative measures are proposed to improve it. If I may venture a suggestion, I would say that before adopting hasty laws it might be well to get the advice of an expert commission on what is best to be done.

"To my mind, one of the greatest evils in any nation is the influence of pernicious lobbying in behalf of special interests. You will pardon my criticism, but the one thing you lack in the United States is concentrated, forceful public opinion. Although the people of the United States are exceptionally active and progressive, yet they are curiously conservative in stamping out evil customs that have gradually grown up. They hesitate to remedy and are slow to punish."

METCALFE MARRIAGE KEPT FAMILY SECRET

Daughter's Wedding to H. E. Watson Feb. 13 Just Revealed by Her Mother.

Mrs. J. G. Metcalfe of Morristown, N. J., announces the marriage of her daughter, Marguerite, to Harold E. Watson of Morristown, on Feb. 13 last. The marriage has been kept a family secret because of the long illness and final death of the late J. G. Metcalfe. It is expected that the young couple will make their home in this city.

The above announcement, which appears among the marriage notices of today's TIMES, will come as a surprise to the friends of the Metcalfe and Watson families in Morristown, both of whom are well known and prominent in the social life of the city. Jacob G. Metcalfe was one of the pioneer railroad men of this country.

No explanation of the announcement could be gained last night from the Metcalfe family, as it was said at their home in Franklin Street that they were absent. George H. Watson, Jr., father of the young man, when told of the announcement at first denied that the marriage had taken place, and afterward asserted that he would neither deny nor confirm it.

The young people had kept their secret so well guarded that no one, not even their friends or neighbors, knew that any attachment existed between them. Mrs. Watson has just returned to Morristown after spending the greater part of the Summer in Lexington, Ky. Her mother was Miss Lucy Garrison of Louisville, Ky. Her father died on Aug. 31 last, in his sixty-seventh year, after a long illness, in the Pocono Mountains, where he had gone in search of health.

He was former President of the Mexican International Railway, a director of the London Underground Railway Company, and consulting railway expert for Speyer & Co., the bankers. He was born in Cambridge, Ohio, and from early manhood advanced rapidly in the railroad world. He took an active part in solving the transportation problems of Peru, Chile and Ecuador, and was called to London to help solve the problem of the London Underground Railway Company, of which he later became a director. He was also Vice President of the Manila Railway Company, and retained this position until the time of his death.

Mrs. Watson is about 22 years old, and her husband is only a few years older. His father is Secretary of the Commercial Tractor Company of 140 Broadway, and they live on Maple Avenue, in Morristown. He is a graduate of Harvard, class of '14.

MISS POWELL A BRIDE.

Daughter of Mr. and Mrs. A. McD. Powell Marries E. T. Bromfield.

The marriage of Miss May Powell, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Alexander McDonald Powell of 326 West Seventy-second Street, to Edward Thomas Bromfield took place at 4:30 o'clock yesterday afternoon at the home of the bride's parents. The Rev. Frank Melville Kerr of the First Presbyterian Church in Hempstead, L. I., performed the ceremony, which was followed by a reception.

The bride, whose father gave her in marriage, wore a gown of cream-colored velvet trimmed with strands of pearls. A Court train of silver cloth depended from the shoulders and was held in place with ruchings of tulle. Her veil of tulle was caught up with orange blossoms and she carried a bouquet of lilies of the valley.

Mrs. Herman Helms of Philadelphia, Penn., as matron of honor, wore a gown of old-blue brocade with touches of rose-colored velvet and a hat to match. She carried an old-fashioned bouquet. The other attendants were Mrs. A. W. Powell and Mrs. Irwin Day. They were attired in gowns of changeable colored taffeta shading from rose to old blue with hats to match, and carried old-fashioned bouquets of mignon roses.

Percy R. Bromfield was his brother's best man, and the ushers were Herman Helms, Jr., W. Powell, W. Atlee Burpee, Jr., David Burpee, and Robert J. and Joseph B. Powell.

After an extended wedding trip Mr. and Mrs. Bromfield will make their home in Brookline, Mass.

MISCHA ELMAN PLAYS.

Violinist Gives a Program That Fully Displays His Varied Gifts.

Mischa Elman, who had been heard earlier in the week as soloist with the Symphony Society of New York, made his first appearance of the season in recital yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. He played Vivaldi's Concerto in G minor; with accompaniment of piano and organ, the allegro moderato from Ernst's Concerto in F sharp minor, Scolero's "Variations on a Theme," by Mozart, four smaller pieces arranged from Bach, Wieniawski, Michiels, and Weber, and Sarasate's "Zigeunerweisen."

This program was well contrived to be at once interesting and well balanced by means of its contrasts, and to display the varied gifts of the player to their full extent. It is likely that Mr. Elman has never played better than he did yesterday, and whether it was because of his mood of the day or because he has passed a year away from the concert stage, during which he has had opportunity to devote himself to reflection and leisurely study, it seemed that his playing had never been more significant along the deeper and subtler sides of his art.

Thus his playing in the Vivaldi concerto was finely elevated and noble, particularly in the adagio, where the best opportunity for these elements was provided. The addition of an organ enhanced the effect of this movement, though it tended somewhat to muddiness in the accompaniment in the succeeding allegro. His playing in Ernst's concerto was downright sensational from the viewpoint of great technical difficulties overcome and subordinated to artistic effect. Ernst was himself a violinist, noted in his day for a sensational technique, and the histories tell of him that he followed Paganini about Europe in an effort to master his methods. The concerto would seem to embody all that Ernst had learned of brilliant and difficult technical matter, although it is not without a musical value also.

The violinists who could play this work as Mr. Elman played it yesterday would probably not require all the fingers of one hand to count. Rapid octave passages which were perfect, impeccable double-stops, and brilliant passage work accomplished without a flaw were all in evidence, and what was remarkable was that this technical accomplishment was easy enough for him to allow of their being subordinated to real musical effect. Some difficult as well as very interesting and well-contrived music was found in a set of "Variations on a Theme," by Mozart, by an unfamiliar composer, Scolero.

In all of his effects Mr. Elman was ably seconded by Walter H. Golde at the piano. The organ part in Vivaldi's work was played by Frank L. Sealy.

Columbia University Concert.

Professor Walter Henry Hall, director of choral music at Columbia University, announced yesterday that the big university concert to be held at Carnegie Hall on Dec. 20 would be free to all of the students and officers of the university. "The Messiah" will be sung. The university chorus has given many other oratorios in the past at Carnegie Hall, but this is the first year that the concert has been thrown open to the students. The chorus consists of about three hundred voices. The soloists who have been selected are: Miss Marie Stoddard, soprano; Miss Scott, contralto; Dan Bedoe, tenor, and Mr. Maitland, bass. Such a concert will be given under the asupices of the Columbia University Extension Teaching Department.

DEMAND FOR STEEL GROWS CONSTANTLY

Railroads, Shipbuilders, Constructors and Warring Nations Besiege Mills for Material.

PRICES BEYOND CONTROL

Quotations for Goods Have Never Varied So in the History of the Industry.

Special to The New York Times.

PITTSBURGH, Oct. 30.—Iron and steel prices are beyond control. Never in the history of the industry has there been such wide ranges in prices. In fact, it is not a question of price, but of delivery. Ridiculously high prices are being demanded and in some instances are being paid.

The plant of the Diamond State Steel Company at Wilmington, Del., which has been idle for eleven years, is being repaired and it is expected will be in operation in ninety days on an order of 50,000 tons of rounds for Great Britain. This mill has been out of date many years, and the fact that it is to be placed in operation will give a faint idea of the severe strain producers are being put to fill the demand.

Sales of pig iron have been enormous. Contracts have been made on the basis of deliveries as rapidly as possible. Starting in the east and sweeping westward and southward, almost every furnace has sold its entire output many months ahead at advanced prices. The Lukens Iron and Steel Company has contracted for 58,000 tons of basic iron for delivery up to and including the second quarter at $17.50, delivered at Coatesville, Penn.

In New York sales during the week aggregated 25,000 tons, one lot of 10,000 tons going to Buffalo furnaces for delivery at Lancaster, N. Y. Japan obtained 2,000 tons of low phosphorus iron at $28.62, at steamer. Italian buyers are seeking iron in the east and have obtained only 1,000 tons of Southern foundry to date.

In Pittsburgh the Allegheny Steel Company is inquiring for 20,000 tons of basic for first half delivery. The American Rolling Mill Company at Middleton, Ohio, is seeking 15,000 tons; the Andrews Steel Company of Newport Ky., is inquiring for 20,000 tons; the Portsmouth Steel Company, Portsmouth, Ohio, is seeking 6,000 tons. Westinghouse interests have obtained 5,000 tons and the American Steel Foundries 5,000 tons. The Rebecca furnace at Kittanning, Penn., has been leased by the Jones & Laughlin Steel Company for the purpose of making ferromanganese from imported ores. The Jones & Laughlin Steel Company is blowing in all of its Aliquippa furnaces.

Large Sales in Cleveland.

Sales in the Buffalo district aggregated 60,000 tons. Cleveland reports large sales and inquiries from one company for 25,000 tons. The Pickands, Mathers Company has blown in the Ella furnace at West Middlesex, Penn. In the West the Federal furnace and the Bayview at Milwaukee will be fired before Dec. 1. Other idle furnaces would be lighted, but it is impossible to secure a supply of ore. Sales in Cincinnati have been large; St. Louis buyers have cleaned up every available ton of iron. Birmingham has sold its vast stock pile and prices are climbing higher daily. An idle furnace has been blown in at Bessemer and another is being got in readiness to resume.

The Carnegie Steel Company has advanced steel bars to 1.50c. If it is possible to buy any at this price an advance of several dollars a ton can be realized on them before they are delivered. Cold rolled shafting has gone up $2 a ton and cold rolled strip steel $8 a ton. Sales of cold rolled shafting have been made at 60 off the list price. The British Government is said to have placed a contract for 50,000 tons of six-inch rounds at between 3.25c. and 3.50c. French interests have placed part of 50,000 tons at Ensley, Ala.

Bar iron is being used instead of steel in many instances and this product has been advanced to 1.50c. Cleveland. Spikes are up to 1.70c., an advance of 10 cents. Steel hoops are quoted at 1.75c., $8 a ton of a raise, bands bringing 1.50c., an increase of $1 a ton since Oct. 25. Structural rivets are selling at 2.90c and boiler rivets at 2c.

Wire prices are higher and will continue to advance. At this writing quotations are as follows: Plain wire, $1.70 a 100 pounds; nails, $1.85 per keg; cut nails, $1.70, f. o. b. Pittsburgh. Canadian interests are seeking wire rods in this country, but have been unsuccessful. A barbed wire plant is to be installed at Collingwood, Ontario, to produce 1,000 tons a month.

C. K. Turner & Sons, 116 Broad Street, New York, are in the market for 40,000 tons of barbed wire for the Russian Government, and a mixed assortment of steel. It is useless to visit Pittsburgh for steel of almost any shape or grade. Every ton that can be delivered within the next six months has been snapped up.

Railroads Now in the Market.

Plates in Pittsburgh are quoted at 1.50c. In Philadelphia they are $1 a ton higher. Platemakers do not want to be bothered with orders. They have enough on hand to keep the rolls turning until late in the Spring. It is doubtful if the mills ever had so many specifications ahead.

The Standard Oil Company has contracted for two tank steamers with the Harlan & Hollingsworth Company, which will require about 7,500 tons of plates. The Norfolk & Western Railroad will take 9,000 tons of plates from the Carnegie Steel Company with which to build 1,000 cars in the company's own shops. The American Ship Building Company will build two vessels for Norwegian interests and figures are being secured for four more. The United States Government will require about 6,00 tons of steel for two dreadnoughts on which bids will be made Nov. 1.

The New York Central Railroad has ordered 9,000 cars within the past few days, and other contracts placed brings aggregate car buying up to 12,000 for the week. Eighty-two locomotives were also contracted for. The Russian Government has placed an order with the Pennsylvania Steel Company for rails running up into thousands of tons. The Wabash has contracted for 7,000 tons, the New York Central 5,000 tons, the Great Northern 5,000 tons, and so on. The Boston & Maine is inquiring for 25,000 tons and the Maine Central for 10,000 tons.

Steel shapes cannot be had under twelve to fourteen weeks. The price has been advanced to 1.50c. Of all the finished materials, shapes are somewhat slower than other forms of steel. Some contracts have been placed as low as 1.40c. for delivery next year, and good round tonnages can be placed at 1.45c. The McClintic-Marshall people took the contract to erect an elevated station in Philadelphia, about 25,000 tons. Seven car floats will be built by the American Bridge Company for the Lehigh Railroad Company.

Sheets have been advanced $4 a ton in one week. South America is taking large quantities of sheets. European countries are also heavy buyers. While quotations are made at 2c. for No. 28 gauge, as high as 2.25c. is being asked and secured. J. P. Morgan & Co. has inquiries out for 6,000 tons of blue annealed sheets, No. 12 and 13 guage. Inquiries have also been made in Philadelphia for sheets of this grade. Tin plate will probably be held at $3.40 a box for next year's delivery.

REWARD FOR WISE RAILROAD POLICY

Money Poured Into Southern Pacific Enables It to Weather a Long Depression.

How can a large railroad system which is passing through successive years of depression, suffering losses in annual earnings of more than $10,000,000, continue to meet expenses and even pay dividends? That question applies to a few of the country's big railroad systems which have continued dividend payments in the last three years just as if nothing had happened. It does not apply to other large railroad systems which were unable to maintain their balance in the face of the cumulative depression.

The financial district was treated to a pleasant surprise last Friday when the stock of the Southern Pacific Railway crossed par, a point which it had been unable to reach since the Spring of 1913. It recalled the remarkable struggles of the Southern Pacific, and, incidentally, the factors which made it possible for the Southern Pacific to live through the recent depression and come out with colors flying.

The secret of the Southern Pacific's success in the face of trying circumstances, railroad men say, lies in the fact that its foundation was solid. Years ago Collis P. Huntington willed that earnings, instead of being paid out in dividends, should be turned back into the Southern Pacific for improvement and extension work. There were objections, but Mr. Huntington and his Board of Directors were firm.

While they increased the basic value of their properties and built up a handsome surplus for lean years, other roads traversing the Western belt paid out dividends. The Missouri Pacific is a good illustration. It has been said that if the Missouri Pacific's board had dared to withhold dividends at the right time the whole Missouri-Pacific system would not be in receivership today. It would have proved economical for the stockholders of the Missouri Pacific if they had turned millions back into the property instead of drawing the millions out. If that had been done it is likely that "Mop" would be selling many times its present price of $5 a share.

The Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway furnishes a similar illustration. The dividends stopped when the depression set in in 1913, but that was too late. They should have stopped in 1910, railroad men say, and some $30,000,000 should then have been spent on regrading in order to meet the encroaching competition of better organized and better managed roads, like the Atchison, for instance.

In 1913, when the depression began to be felt, the Southern Pacific on its 10,311 miles of road earned $142,775,000. In 1914, with 10 increased mileage of 111 miles, it earned only $138,520,000. In 1915 the gross revenues dropped to $128,800,000. In 1915 the road earned a surplus of 9.85 per cent., which was cut to 7.50 per cent. this year. Notwithstanding its difficulties, the road continued to pay its 6 per cent. dividends. This was safe, first, because the dividend was more than earned, and, second, because there was a reserve fund in the treasury.

SAVES $500,000 ON SUBWAY

City Gets Guarded Easement Under Brooklyn Piers for $275,000.

As the result of negotiations between the Public Service Commission and the New York Dock Company a troublesome question concerning the construction of the two new subway tubes to Brooklyn has been settled, and in addition the city has been saved about $500,000 and the dock company has undertaken a permanent improvement of its property at a cost of about $1,250,000.

The New York Dock Company occupies piers along the Brooklyn shore of the East River devoted in the main to the West Indian and South American trade. Under its property already runs the Interborough tube to Joralemon Street, and it was necessary for the Public Service Commission to acquire an easement for the new tube to Clark Street. The new Montague Street tube, however, landed under city property. When, however, the commission began to negotiate about taking certain property at the foot of Clark Street, the dock company replied that this would interfere with its plans for the development of its waterfront; and that it should have to ask from the city for the property and the consequential damages some $600,000.

The commission set to work to get around this demand, and, after consultation with the dock company and Dock Commissioner Smith, ascertained that the latter was about to condemn the dock company's pier to the south of Joralemon Street and order its removal. This meant that the present Interborough tube would be exposed to damage from vessels floating over it, and the commission's engineers declared that it would be necessary to put a concrete blanket over the existing structure for its protection, which would cost $100,000.

It also appeared that the dock company was about to realign all its existing piers, and that the two new tubes would be uncovered, so that over each of these also a concrete blanket must be constructed at a cost of about $200,000.

Negotiations then began with the dock company, and the latter pointed out that the city owned certain property at the foot of Joralemon Street and Montague Street that it particularly wanted to get hold of. If it could buy these parcels it would own an undivided strip along the East River shore, and it would be able to develop it as a whole much more advantageously for itself and its shippers. It was willing, it said, to sell to the city the easement it needed at Clark Street for $275,000, and to give at least $75,000 for the Montague Street property and $25,000 for the Joralemon Street parcel, thus granting the city only the balance the Clark Street rights for $175,000.

Moreover, the company would undertake to erect new large piers at Joralemon, Montague, and Clark Streets, each of which would be ample protection for the subway tubes beneath, and so the city would be saved the $300,000 which it appeared it would have to spend on concrete blankets. To this the city replied that it would sell the two parcels the dock people wanted, provided it preserved the right to recapture. This means that, supposing the city ever carries out its policy of acquiring the entire harbor front, when it comes to condemn the dock company's property it will have to pay for these particular strips merely what it has received for them, plus the cost of improvements and less depreciation.

So the bargain has been struck. The New York Dock Company intends now to build, at a cost of $1,250,000, five new piers which will be from 640 to 750 feet in length and much broader than those which now are in use, thus doubling its present accommodations. On the other hand the city will acquire without cost to itself adequate protection for the subway tubes, and will effect a saving which has been calculated at $500,000.

BOSTON COPPER GOSSIP.

Closing of Cananea Mine Greatly Reduces Mexico's Production.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Oct. 30.—Resumption of domestic buying of copper at 18 cents is reported this week, and producers are in receipt of new orders. The closing of the mines at Cananea, Mexico, will reduce that country's production about 10,000,000 pounds a month.

The Calumet and Hecla Company is reported to have made heavy sales of late, one transaction involving 30,000,000 pounds. The closing of the mines at Cananea is said to be due to the burning of railway bridges by Villa's troops. With the completion of the new electric hoist United Verde Extension will have a capacity of 1,000 tons of ore a day.

The Calle Copper Company's production has established a record surpassing early estimates, and is at present turning out copper at the rate of 120,000,000 pounds a year. The cost is 6 cents. Granby Consolidated produced 4,100,000 pounds of copper in September. Two shafts on the Anaconda property have been closed because of an oversupply of ore at the company's smelters.

WANTS RAILROADS RULED BY REGIONS

Frank Trumbull Explains That Wage Problems Are Now Settled by Districts.

PRESENT SYSTEM CHAOTIC

Suggests That Principle of Federal Bank Organization Would Simplify Regulation.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, Oct. 30.—Speaking before a body of leading railroad men of the country gathered at the Hotel Blackstone tonight in honor of the seventieth birthday of E. P. Ripley, head of the Santa Fe system, Frank Trumbull, Chairman of the Chesapeake and Ohio, said that one great trouble of the railroads was that they were regulated by forty-nine interlocking Directors. These Directors, he stated, were the forty-eight States and the Federal Government.

"I shall not undertake to describe before a group of men like this," said Mr. Trumbull, "the piecemeal, patchwork, burdensome, and conflicting State regulation of railroads. Freight cars go everywhere, and if the railroads of Texas, for example, be crippled, there is impairment and waste not only in Texas, but in every State.

"So far as I know, no one has yet assembled in one tragic exhibit the needless expense, the crudities, and the irreparable losses which this interlocking regulation has imposed upon railway administration. Omitting figures but stating facts, what is the situation of the railroads of the country, considered as a whole? Their net operating income for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1915, was not as great as in 1910, 1911, or 1912, and the loss in comparison with 1912 was even greater. There are now abundant crops and various signs of returning prosperity, but who shall say whether this is permanent or only hectic?

Roads Need Great Sums.

"In the last four years probably not less than $1,500,000,000 has been dedicated by private investors to the public service in the form of additional railroad property, but, as I have said, the net operating income of the railroads has been diminished. Is it any wonder that there is practically no appetite for fresh railroad development, particularly at a time when investors can get high rates of interest and the profits of other trades? If $1,500,000,000 has been required during years of restricted business, why not that much or more in the years that are immediately ahead of us—years of possibly greatly increased traffic? Where is the reserve preparation for it? If we have a big business, will the transportation machine break down, and if it does, who will blame the farmers? May not the shippers, while saving in rates, have risked their profits? I do not argue the question of Government ownership. The Government has owned the wagon roads of this country for 300 years, and they are sufficient answer. It would be interesting, would it not, to have a governmental valuation of the wagon roads, showing, as in the case of the railroads, the original cost to date, the cost of reproduction, &c.?

"Many sincere and honest citizens ask why should not the railroads accept the same vicissitudes as general business. This is a proper question to ask and a proper one to answer. Government puts limitations upon the prices which railroads may charge and requires them to remain in business every day in the year whether or no. These are the two important features which differentiate the railway business from other business of the country.

Regulation Must Be Wise.

"Please understand that I make no protest against regulation of railroads by public authority. Wise regulation is in the public interest but regulation to be successful must be responsible; it must be consistent; it must provide some sort of assurance to future investors as to treatment which they will receive. If the treatment is niggardly, even in a few states, railroad investment will be restricted. If the treatment is liberal, railroad investment and enterprise will be stimulated. The fundamental weakness of the present situation is that by reason of the inconsistency, the complexity, and often the contradictions, involved in the present system of regulation, the railroad officer cannot make any promises as to the treatment which investors in his property will receive. That is a difficult position in which to put any conscientious man, seeking additional capital. Again, no matter how well or satisfactorily the Interstate Commerce Commission may do its work, the entire fabric can be disarranged through counteracting influences of state commissions and legislative bodies."

More and more people, Mr. Trumbull continued, are coming to believe that what the United States has done for its banking system should also be done for the common carriers. He hinted that one way of finding a regulatory system better than the present would be to group the States into regional sections much as the Federal Reserve system is arranged. This procedure was suggested some time ago by Mr. Ripley.

Regulation by Regions.

"Have you observed the evolution which is going on in connection with the railroads?" continued Mr. Trumbull. "More and more questions are being considered regionally; for example, wages and rates. Would any one expect the employes of the railroads to consent to a different rate of pay in each State? In the rate hearings presentations to the Interstate Commerce Commission are made by the railroads in large regional groups, and the States themselves are co-operating regionally in their opposition. The fascinating task of this generation, therefore, converges upon methods for promoting national unity. This country is taking back from Europe one of its millions its own securities. I hope it may own them all. If the railroad and other statesmen can by friendly, intelligent co-operation make railroad stocks so desirable that any man or woman will be glad to put his or her savings directly into them, railroad debt can be carried much easier, the railroad problem will be solved, and the incomes of those who save will be increased, in comparison with rates allowed by banks on savings of depositors.

"If the Government can by legislation make banking safe and the transportation of property and people safe, can it not also promote safety of railroad stocks. If I seem to criticise our present system of regulation, it is not to criticise the principle or to seek relaxation in the stringency, but to ask that the public give its thought to bringing into existence a scheme of regulation under which railroad officers and investors in railroad property may know, one way or another, precisely what they may expect from public authority."

FEW WANT FRESH AIR CARS.

Chicago Experiment Raises No Noticeable Demand Here.

The news, printed in THE TIMES on Thursday, of the experiment of running cars in Chicago without heat and with open windows for the pleasure of fresh-air devotee, interested the Interborough officials here, but did not make them very communicative.

Several of them talked, but made it a condition that their names should not be used. This desire was largely due, it was suspected, to a wholesome fear of the Public Service Commission. The consensus was that cars without heat and open windows in cold weather would never become popular here.

At the same time, it was admitted that persons favoring plentiful cold air was growing. As a sign of this it was pointed out that when the buses began running almost every passenger rode inside and that now many of them climb on top and shiver there during the whole trip. Mayor Gaynor, it was said, once wrote a letter to the effect that a man was for cold weather did himself harm by riding for any length of time in a conveyance that was warm and then getting out into the cold again.

One official said that no apartment in the city was ever kept warmer than 65 degrees in very cold weather, but that patrons of the Interborough have objected if the cars were not always kept at 70. He said this couldn't be done, because every time the door was opened all of the warm air blew out and cold air blew in. These, however, were facts that no official of the company here hoped to beat into the public head. Here is a quotation from a nameless official of the company:

"We have tried all sorts of things in obedience to what appeared to be a public demand. But they all failed because the public very frequently only wants something as long as it doesn't apear able to get it. Give it to them and instantly they holler for us to take it away. Suppose we put smoking cars on our trains? Do you suppose the women would stay out of them in the rush hours? Certainly not if there happened to be any room in them. Suppose we put a car exclusively for women on the trains? Would the men stay out of them? Certainly not, and if the men stayed out the women wouldn't patronize them. It is impossible to separate the men and women. They will get together if they can. That's nature.

"I don't know whether this Chicago fresh air thing will last very long, but I am inclined to think that it will soon peter out. Persons who don't want fresh air will surely crowd into that car if the other cars are full, and they will complain bitterly about being cold, about contracting various disease and about a favored class. I feel certain that those fresh air cars will be taken off. That is, they will be if the Chicago lines do as much business as our lines do."

LIVERPOOL DRAWS ATTACK BY BEARS

New York Element's Effort to Break the Cotton Market Has Partial Success.

STEADY RISE AFTER OPENING

Local Exchange Estimates the Visible Supply of All Kinds at 5,020,000 Bales.

According to cables received yesterday morning the cotton bears in New York made a strong effort to break Liverpool. Prices there closed about 10 points lower than due, thus paving the way for our market to open about 20 points down. There was only a partial response to this showing, however, and after opening at about half this loss the market moved up steadily and closed around the best prices of the day at a net decline of 2 to 3 points.

At the present time two powerful contending forces are in the market, with the bull party led by E. G. Scales, while the bears consist chiefly of some of the old-line spot firms who are very much impressed with the weakness in foreign exchange, the moderate demand for export, and the recent good weather in the South which they believe will add materially to the crop.

An estimate on the Indian crop of 5,300,000 bales sent out by Ralli Bros. was published late Friday afternoon. Exception is taken to these figures by the well-known firm of Mitsui & Co., who point out that last season's production was 5,965,000, while this year there was a reduction of 22 per cent. in acreage. This firm also says that its latest advices from Bombay place the Indian crop at 3,840,000 bales. The East Indian bale weighs only 400 pounds.

According to the New York Cotton Exchange the visible supply of cotton, all kinds, is 5,020,000 bales, against 3,742,000 last year. The visible supply of American cotton is 3,851,000, against 2,570,000 last year. The visible supply of American cotton increased 125,000, against an increase of 247,000 last year, and 346,000 two years ago.

Southern spot markets, officially reported were unchanged, 12 points lower to thirteen points higher. The local market for spot cotton was quiet, 5 points decline. Middling, 12.25. Futures closed steady.

LOST A BETHLEHEM PROFIT.

Heirs, Selling 200 Shares Too Soon, Sacrificed $120,000.

By selling a block of 200 shares of Bethlehem Steel stock last year at a figure between 50 and 60, heirs of Cleveland S. Stillwell, of Sag Harbor, L. I., lost about $120,000 which the estate would have gained if the shares had been held. Final settlement of the estate was made before Surrogate Nicholl, of Suffolk County, yesterday.

TOM SHEVLIN TO HELP COACH YALE ELEVEN

SHEVLIN COMING TO YALE'S RESCUE

Famous End to Take Up Task on Which Hinkey Has Failed.

Tom Shevlin, a member of the All-American football teams of 1903, 1904, and 1905, and one of the best ends to represent Yale on the gridiron, last night notified the New Haven authorities that he would join the coaching squad at Yale on Tuesday. It is understood that the former end was asked to help the Blue eleven out of its present predicament.

The three defeats of the Yale eleven this year—by Virginia, Washington and Jefferson, and yesterday by Colgate—were responsible for the almost frantic efforts of Yale football authorities to get a number of former stars to the Yale Bowl in order to get the Yale team out of its present slump.

It is the general opinion of the coaches and followers of the team that there is plenty of excellent material at New Haven for a good eleven, but that the men have not been developed under a system which would bring out their greatest strength.

There have been rumors about the Yale campus for some days that there would be some changes in the coaching staff, but this is the first indication that the situation had come to a head. It is many years since a Yale eleven has had such a disastrous season, and with the Princeton and Harvard games coming within a few weeks, the athletic authorities have become desperate in an effort to whip the team into some kind of shape.

When Shevlin returns to New Haven it is expected that several other former Yale gridiron stars who have not been asked to coach for the last few seasons will also return. In years past when a Yale eleven has been in much the same situation as Captain Wilson's team, all petty differences among the coaches have been forgotten, and the old players have rallied to the cause and pulled the eleven out of a bad hole.

Shevlin is one of the best end coaches in the country and has proved this with Yale elevens in the past. His strong personality has been a big incentive to the players and his never-say-die spirit has worked wonders with a slumping eleven.

When Shevlin was Captain at Yale Walter Camp said of him, "Shevlin starts in as a tackle himself and there is no end that can match him in power or in quality. He bears the burdens of the captaincy without letting them affect his own play. He is a decided factor in Yale's open offensive play and few are the teams that care to attempt his end on the attack or repeat the attempt when once it had been tried. He is unselfish in his play as well, for upon one or two occasions he deliberately weakened his own side of the line in order to protect other weaker points."

INFANT DAYS OF FOOTBALL.

Soldiers Played Brutal Game to Keep in Physical Condition.

Some studious highbrow, with plenty of time on his hands, has been delving into the archives of the deep, dead past and has discovered a lot of things about the infant days of the game of football. The earliest inclination to play the game is found among the ancient Spartans. They were at war most of the time, and between battles they played football to keep in training.

They called the game "harpaston," and it was played on a rectangular field with goal lines. The object of the game was to get the football over the goal line, regardless of how it was done. "Fair means or foul," was their motto, and there were no rules. It was a bone-breaking game, but it kept the Spartan soldiers in the pink of condition.

As soon as the soldiers got their morning bulletin and learned that there was no battle on that day they chose sides and had a game of football. This not only kept the soldiers in fine fettle, but it also kept the hospital corps of the Spartan army in practice. As there were no rules, naturally no time was lost for men out for broken heads or broken legs. There were plenty of eager substitutes in those days, anyway.

Later, among the wild Germanic tribes there was a primitive game of football. They had a big, bagpike ball, which they regarded kick and butt with their hearts' delight. Even the Eskimo had a game where they kicked a ball of skin filled with moss among the icefloes. The earliest white men who went to the South Sea islands found that the natives played a football game with a ball made of bamboo fibre, and Cortez tells of the Aztecs playing a football game.

The first inkling of football in English literature is found where William Fitzstephen tells about the game. He writes that "after dinner all the youth of the hamlet go into the fields in the suburbs and address themselves to the game of football." Legislation against the game came as early as the fourteenth century, when Edward II. proclaimed that, "Foreasmuch as there is great noise in the city, caused by hustling over large footballs, we forbid such a game to be played in the future."

Henry VI. was equally opposed, and said: "The King forbides that no man play futball." It was so rough that many were killed, and not only that, but football had taken the place of archery in popular favor, and the result was that the youths who joined the army were poor marksmen with the bow and arrow.

The game grew rapidly in England and Scotland, and in the Highlands, when a spirited game resulted in a tie at sundown, it was the custom to cut the football in two and give each team half. About this time a Frenchman visiting Scotland saw the game, and he wrote: "Well, if this is play, then take me back to France when they begin to fight." Shrove Tuesday was then the popular football day in England.

The game was first taken up by the secondary schools in England before it reached the universities. At Rugby School one of the first codes of rules was formulated. The first intercollegiate match was held between Oxford and Cambridge in 1872.

Football was known in America in the early days, being transplanted from the other side. As early as 1609 in the book, "Relation of Virginia," it is stated that "they used to play football. They make the gooles like ours," wrote an Englishman, "only they never fight nor pull another down." So it can readily be seen that the game as introduced here was not as savage a pastime as it afterward developed.

Football was first introduced at Harvard in 1836, when they played with a black rubber ball which was so light that it could be batted about in the air by the fists. It was something like a toy balloon. Later this ball was abandoned and the students played with a ball "filled with grass, rags and paper." The best man on the teams then was the one who could do the most damage to his adversaries' shins.

MAY WITHDRAW BRICKLEY.

Trinity Practically Decides to Accede to Request of N. Y. U.

The controversy between New York University and Trinity College over the eligibility of George Brickley to play for the Hartford college on Election Day reached a climax yesterday when Frank H. Cann, Director of Athletics at New York University, presented a communication in person to the Advisory Alumni Committee of Trinity College at Hartford in which Trinity was requested to withdraw Brickley from her line-up against New York University on Tuesday. While making no effort to bring into question Brickley's status the communication admits that his presence in the line-up would jeopardize the amateur standing of at least two New York University players and conveyed the polite intimation that in the event of a refusal the game would be canceled, regardless of the friendly relations which have always existed between the two institutions.

The communication was approved by a majority of the Trinity College Advisory Committee, but owing to the absence of two of the members, final action was postponed until today, when it is expected that Brickley will be withdrawn.

The action of Director Cann was precipitated by Gustavus T. Kirby, President of the Intercollegiate A. A. A. A., who yesterday announced that members of N. Y. U. playing against Trinity with Brickley in the game would automatically professionalize themselves. The statement of President Kirby was the outcome of a request for a ruling on the rules of the Intercollegiate Athletic Association regarding the status of the members of the Violet team in the event of playing against Brickley.

Should any attempt be made to evade the issue President Kirby says the rule relating to professionalism will be strictly enforced, notwithstanding the fact that the clause covering this particular case has not been strictly lived up to in the past, and at the same time he assured the Violet authorities that in the future it would rigidly be applied to other institutions who have athletic relations with Trinity College.

BEDFORD PARK TENNIS.

Hartman Wins Singles Title and Ostendorf and Raymond Doubles.

Ingo Hartman, A. J. Ostendorf, and R. B. Raymond divided the honors in the final rounds of the men's singles and doubles championship tournament of the Bedford Park Lawn Tennis Club yesterday on the club courts at Bedford Park. Hartman won the singles title and Ostendorf and Raymond divided the doubles championship. It is the first year since the organization of the club that the singles championship has not been won by J. H. Steinkampf. The latter was eliminated by Ostendorf early in the tournament.

Both contests were long drawn out. Hartman was forced to five hard sets to win from Ostendorf in the final round. The scores were 6—3, 4—6, 9—7, 6—3, 6—2, or a total of fifty-seven games. While Ostendorf and Raymond won from Hartman and Guy Brinckerhoff in another five-set match at 5—7, 6—3, 5—7, 8—6, 7—5. The match required fifty-nine games to reach a decision, or two more than in the singles final. Raymond, who is a former President of the club, showed up strong and held his own with his younger partner. The summary:

Bedford Park Lawn Tennis Club, Men's Singles, Championship.—Final Round—Ingo Hartman defeated A. J. Ostendorf, 6—3, 4—6, 9—7, 6—3, 6—2.

Men's Doubles.—A. J. Ostendorf and R. B. Raymond defeated Ingo Hartman and Guy Brinckerhoff, 5—7, 6—3, 5—7, 8—6, 7—5.

Real Estate Tennis Finals.

Benjamin M. Phillips and Stanley N. Isaacs won the Class A doubles tennis tournament of the Real Estate Board of Trade, defeating Roy D. Richey and E. A. Ashley in the final round in straight sets at 8—6, 6—4. The match which was played on the courts of the Harlem Tennis Club was an unusual one, and showed the plucky play of Phillips and Isaacs. In the first set, with the score tying games one and 10—all in favor of Richey and Ashley, the latter made desperate efforts to obtain the winning point, but their opponents pulled the set out of the fire after it had gone to deuce several times. The second set was a repetition of the first with the score 4 to 1 in favor of Richey and Ashley, when Phillips and his partner again overcame the lead and captured the match by taking five straight games.

OFFER WILLARD $45,000.

Champion May Box Moran, Smith, and Weinert or Dillon Here.

Jess Willard has received an offer of $45,000 for three boxing matches at Madison Square Garden with Frank Moran, Gunboat Smith, and the winner of the Weinert-Dillon bout. If Willard accepts the offer Moran will box the champion in the first, second, or third bout, as he pleases. Smith is willing to box Willard for nothing just to have a chance to repeat the victory over Willard before the conqueror of Johnson became champion.

Weinert has contended that he has as good a chance to defeat Willard as any heavyweight has.

"I will be one of the three to box the champion and I hope I get him first," said Weinert at his camp yesterday. "Why should Moran come ahead of me? I overcame Coffey in Philadelphia and I gave Jim Savage the worst defeat of his life. When Savage boxed Moran the referee had to stop the match in the seventh round to save Moran from a knock-out."

To Play Off in Round Robin.

Through some misunderstanding, three players in the interscholastic individual golf championship are involved in the final match. So it has been decided that the three youngsters play a round robin, and an attempt will be made to settle matters next Saturday. Those involved are Herbert Oberndoerfer of the High School of Commerce; Herbert Guley of Hackensack, and Clarence Hicks of Stuyvesant.

The third and semi-final match rounds were run off yesterday over the public links at Van Cortlandt Park. E. Fitzgibbons of the Yonkers High School, although beaten by Guley in the afternoon, was the object of admiration on the part of the schoolboys. He has only one arm, the right one.

Oberndoerfer brought off the sensational shot of the day on the eighteenth hole. Slicing his ball behind a tree, on his drive, he made such an excellent out that he laid his opponent, Harold Richlees, a dead stymie. Richlees had reached the green on his second shot. Oberndoerfer won the hole and the match by 1 up.

Baltusrol Club Results.

Schuyler Van Vechten won the Irving K. Taylor Cup yesterday at the Baltusrol Golf Club, when he defeated W. A. Phillips by 3 up and 1 to play in the decisive test. Van Vechten had to concede his opponent five strokes as a handicap. The winner went around in 81 to the loser's 88.

In the final match for the Baltusrol Cup Howard Hasbrouck defeated W. G. McKnight, conceding two strokes, by 4 up and 3 to play. There is a tie for the season ringer competition between Van Vechten and Stephen P. Nash, each of whom has a selected score of 57 for the season.

Montclair Golf Club.

As the result of the semi-final matches in the club championship C. J. Turner and A. C. Pratt will fight it out in the final this week for the title of the Montclair Golf Club. Only a few were entered in the sweepstakes, F. E. Donohoe leading Class A with 86, 4—81. J. W. Allen, Class B, with 92, 14—78, and H. G. Hornfeck in Class C with 109, 30—79. Mrs. J. B. Kremer won the woman's putting competition, while Mrs. H. G. Plimpton was second.

Fox Hills Golf Club.

In addition to the second round of match play for the Manhattan, Brooklyn, and Richmond trophies at the Fox Hills Golf Club yesterday, an eighteen-hole medal play handicap was run off in two classes. A triple tie resulted in the Class A, involving Richard R. Mamlok, jr., G. Spindler, and W. F. Jocklin, each with 81. De Courcy Cleveland led Class B, with 93, 20—73.

FIVE NEW YORK BOYS WIN BOUTS

These and Three from Cleveland Will Get Free Trips to San Francisco.

Five New York amateur boxers and three from Cleveland will go to San Francisco next month to compete in a tournament at the Panama-Pacific Exposition, as the result of their victories in the finals of the Eastern tryouts at the New York A. C. and Crescent A. C., the proceeds from which will be devoted to the James E. Sullivan memorial fund. It is expected that about $2,500 will be raised for this purpose in the two nights' boxing at the New York and Crescent Clubs.

The winners in the various classes of free trips to the Exposition are: 108-pound class, Meyer Perkel, Educational Alliance, New York; 115-pound class, William Prior, Cleveland Athletic Club; 125-pound class, Charles Leonard, unattached, New York; 135-pound class, Vincent Pokorney, Cleveland A. C.; 145-pound class, John Karpinsky, Cleveland A. C.; 158-pound class, John Gaddi, St. Bartholomew A. C., New York; 175-pound class, William Spengler, Trinity Club, New York; heavyweight class, Arthur Sheridan, Trinity Club, New York.

As was the case on Friday night, the gymnasiums of both the New York A. C. and Crescent A. C. were taxed to their capacity to accommodate the spectators.

Fast boxing ruled in nearly all the semi-final and final bouts, but there were a few exceptions to this rule. Some of the decisions were not rendered to the entire satisfaction of the spectators in both clubs. This was notably the in the victory of John Gaddi of the St. Bartholomew Club over Adolph Kaufman of the Trinity Club, in the 158-pound division. At the conclusion of three of the warmest rounds ever contested by amateurs, the judges could not agree and Referee George Schwegler ordered another round. In the extra period of two minutes it seemed to a majority of the spectators as if Kaufman had gained a clear lead on points. Once more, however, the judges disagreed, and when the decision was put up to Schwegler he did not hesitate in giving it to Gaddi. This verdict aroused a shout of disapproval, and caused the announcement from Schwegler that he was serving as referee for the good of the sport and without compensation, and that he only had the courage of his convictions when he picked the St. Bartholomew representative.

Over at the Crescent A. C. a similar incident occurred when Referee Eddie Forbes adjudged Meyer Perkel of the Education Alliance A. C. winner over Robert White of Cleveland Athletic Club in the final of the 108-pound section. Perkel and White, after wading through their opponents in flashy style, came together with a crash in the final and for three rounds there was plenty of action. At the conclusion of the regulation period the judges disagreed as to the winner, and Forbes, instead of ordering another round, as is customary, gave his decision to Perkel. This verdict met with hisses and jeers.

The surprise of the tournament was the defeat of Matty Herbert, the Panama-Pacific 108-pound champion, by Willie Prior of the Cleveland A. C. in the deciding bout of the 115-pound class. The little Irish boy from the Forest City was far better than Herbert last night and gave him a severe lacing. It was the worst defeat Herbert has received in his career.

Charley Leonard of New York was the bright light of the tournament. He fairly startled the spectators at the New York A. C. on Friday night with his terrific punch, and last night at the Crescent A. C. he won both his semi-final and final bouts in the 125-pound class by knockouts in the first round. The summary:

Results of Bouts Last Night.

Artie Edwards, the Jersey City bantamweight, was entitled to the honors over Frankie Daly of Staten Island at the conclusion of their ten-round bout at the Sharkey Athletic Club, Sixty-fifth Street and Columbus Avenue, last night. Edwards was outweighed by five pounds, but his cleverness and effective use of a left hand jab earned the decision for him by a shade. In the seventh round Daly scored a knockdown when Daly toppled to the floor, partly as the result of a left swing and partly because he was off-balance. He regained his feet immediately. Joe Stanley of Philadelphia scored a knockout over Jimmy Carroll in the fifth round of their ten-round contest, with a right to the jaw and a left to the stomach, and in the other ten-round bout Mickey Donley of Newark outpointed Buddy Naddler.

Tom McCarty, a Western heavyweight, failed to appear against George Rodel, the Boer warrior, in the main ten-round contest last night at the Broadway Sporting Club of Brooklyn. In his place the management substituted Sailor Carroll of Brooklyn, and he proved an easy victim for the heavy blows of Rodel, who had a clear advantage throughout. From the tap of the opening gong Rodel forced the milling and during the final session he had his opponent holding. Charlie Woods and Young Shaw, Brooklyn lightweights, were the principals in the other ten-round contest, and the final bell found the latter a winner by a wide margin.

Englewood Country Club.

A tie resulted in the eighteen-hole medal play handicap at the Englewood Country Club yesterday. As it happened, A. D. Childs and James Barber were the only two to return cards. Their respective scores were 87, 7—80 and 102, 22—80.

Tome Scores Over Hill School.

Special to The New York Times.

POTTSTOWN, Penn., Oct. 30.—Tome School scored a victory over her rival, Hill School, in a well-played game here this afternoon by the score of 23 to 0.

ROBERTSON BEST HARRIER.

Captures First Honors in Morris H. S. Cross-Country Run.

Further proof that he is about the best schoolboy cross-country runner in the metropolitan district, was furnished yesterday by A. Robertson, of Evander Childs High School, when he defeated a field of almost 100 Harriers, representing eight schools in the open interscholastic hill and dale chase promoted by Morris High School in Crotona Park, the Bronx. Swept over the course by a gale which at times raised clouds of dust that made the contestants invisible to thousands of spectators less than 100 yards away, Robertson covered the approximate four miles in 22 minutes and 33 seconds. The winner of last year's Columbia interscholastic cross-country run had to fight every inch of the way to get in front. It was his remarkable stamina which brought him across the finish line seven yards in front of F. W. Fleck of Morris High. One of the best harriers in the big field was N. Nolte of St. Benedict's School of Newark, N. J., who lost the course a mile from home when he was leading by fully fifty yards, and then came back to finish in third place, only eight seconds back of Robertson. These boys will come together again on Nov. 13, in Columbia's annual schoolboy chase, and under equal conditions it would not be surprising to see Nolte prove his superiority over Robertson.

Barringer High School of Newark was represented by a more evenly balanced team than any of its rival institutions, and captured the team honors with the small score of 49 points. The other Newark school, St. Benedict's, was a close second with 53 points, and Jamaica High was third with 72 points.

Schneider of Barringer, who finished seventh, gave a courageous exhibition for a youngster, running the last two miles of the race without his right shoe and suffering severely from a cut on his first toe which he received from a jagged rock.

The Crotona Park course was too rugged for almost half of the boys who competed and many of those who did not quit finished in such a fatigued condition that they needed careful attention in the dressing room before they were permitted to leave. The finish:

Robertson, Evander Childs, 22:33 1-5; Fleck, Morris, 22:35 4-5; Nolte, St. Benedict's, 22:41; Repp, Jamaica, 22:56; Fisher, St. Benedict's, 22:58; Bliss, Jamaica; Schneider, Barringer; T. Tully, St. Benedict's; Ellis, Barringer; Granger, Barringer; Jacobus, Barringer; Chittick, Barringer; Werner, Barringer; Roche, Jamaica; Balestier, Morris; Tracey, Flushing; Lloyd, St. Benedict's; Bozza, Barringer; Rosenbluma, Morris; Brown, Mount Vernon; Cohen, Morris; Rogers, Evander Childs; J. Entries for Bulldog Show.

Several Canadian entries have been received for the bulldog show which will be held at the McAlpin Hotel on Election Day. The show entry is larger than last year, and includes the best types of the English breed in this country. The Canadian dogs include the Toronto champions, Lafine Chief, Judy of Lambern, and Parkdale Miss Muffet. Among the American-bred types will be Gaby Deslys, winner of many blue ribbons, and Astoria Baron, both being New York representatives. The Inwall Kennels, owned by Mr. and Mrs. A. M. Inwall, has entered the well-known winners Baron Beaming and Florence Bundha, a cup winner at the last New York show. There are more than 200 entries for the show, which will be held in the winter garden on the McAlpin Roof.

Players Hurt in Pennsylvania.

PHILADELPHIA, Oct. 30.—Accidents in football games played in Pennsylvania today were more numerous than usual. At South Bethlehem, Rowe and Hoar of the Gettysburg College team, playing against Lehigh University, sustained broken ribs. Kicklin of the Ursinus College team, playing against Lebanon Valley College at Collegeville, was carried from the game with concussion of the brain. At Harrisburg, William C. Britch of the Harrisburg Technical School, fractured an arm and dislocated a shoulder. At Steelton, Harvey Dayhoff of the Steelton High school collided with Edgar Cornwall of Williamsport High. The left shoulder of each was dislocated and fractured.

Notes on Motor Cycling.

The introduction of a new principle in motor cycle motor design has resulted in simpler, lighter, and cheaper machines, and it is believed that the tendency toward these less speedy mounts will serve to bring many more people into the ranks of motor cyclists.

The new type of motor is called a "two-cycle," because it has one power impulse for every revolution of the crank shaft, as against one impulse for every two revolutions in the four-cycle motor.

Aside from the quite evident advantage which makes possible the elimination of one cylinder without impairing the smooth running of the motor, the two-cycle has one other feature that commends it to the motor cyclists. There is not a valve in it; in fact, the crank shaft, the connecting rod, and the piston are the only moving parts. The ports for the intake and exhaust of the gases are opened and closed by the piston itself. This, too, tends toward reduced weight and simplicity. And the two-cycle needs no separate oiling system, the lubricant being mixed directly with the gasoline and fed through the carburetor with the fuel. Thus, oil pumps, pipes, and tanks are done away with.

E. G. Baker, the transcontinental rider, is off on a trip to Australia. He will make a run of 1,200 miles around Australia and another end-to-end run of about 600 miles from Sydney to Melbourne.

Paul Gott, a motor cycle dealer of Peoria, Ill., with Harry Dipple as tandem passenger, will endeavor in the near future to make a non-stop twenty-four-hour ride.

Motor cyclists of Champaign and Urbana, Ill., have banded together under the name of Twin Cities Motor Cycle Club and have affiliated with the F. A. M. W. V. Stockwell is President; F. W. Bakers, Vice President, and C. D. Rencrew, Secretary and Treasurer.

The Milwaukee Motor Cycle Club is planning its second annual motor cycle, bicycle, and accessory show. While the date has not been set, it is given tentatively as about Jan. 15.

DR. HILLIS AGREES TO AN ARBITRATION

Dispute with Ferguson, Former Business Agent, Is to be Taken Out of Court.

BOTH PLEDGED TO SILENCE

Ministerial Friends Persuade the Plymouth Church Pastor to Avoid Further Public Scandal.

Through the efforts of ministerial friends of the two men, the controversy between the Rev. Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis, pastor of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, and Frank L. Ferguson, his former business agent, over the financial affairs of the clergyman, is to be taken out of court and their differences submitted to arbitration. The agreement was brought about by the Rev. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, pastor of the Central Congregational Church, and the Rev. Dr. Nacy McGee Waters, pastor of the Tompkins Avenue Congregational Church.

Both ministers, desiring to end the unpleasant situation, worked with Dr. Hillis and Mr. Ferguson for several days, urging that they settle their dispute other than by court proceedings. Dr. Hillis and his former business administrator were finally brought together yesterday morning in Dr. Cadman's study. It was their first meeting for some months. Before they met they had agreed, in a general way, through the ministerial mediators, to submit the matters over which they were at odds to arbitration.

Dr. Cadman and Dr. Waters explained their plan for settling the trouble and found the two disputants in a receptive mood. After a long conference, Dr. Hillis and Mr. Ferguson signed a paper agreeing to arbitration. Each of the principals is to select an arbitrator, the two arbitrators to elect a third.

It was agreed that the legal proceedings brought against Mr. Ferguson by Dr. Hillis should be dropped and that there should be no further public discussion of their differences by either.

Mr. Ferguson was attorney for Dr. Hillis for five years and handled most of the minister's business affairs while the pastor of Plymouth was engaged in timber land operations in the West. Recently Dr. Hillis obtained a court order requiring that his former agent be examined before Official Referee William D. Dickey as to his administration of the clergyman's affairs. Dr. Hillis sought to have Mr. Ferguson examined that he might obtain information upon which to base a complaint in a suit.

Mr. Ferguson applied to vacate the order, which, he declared, was only a move in a "fishing excursion." Justice Kelly, in the Supreme Court, heard argument on the motion last Wednesday, and on Friday decided in favor of Mr. Ferguson, vacating the order for his examination. Justice Kelly said he thought that the plaintiff's affidavit contained all the necessary facts to enable him to frame a complaint for an accounting.

While the Hillis-Ferguson controversy has been thrown out of court, thr is still pending against the pastor of Plymouth Church a suit for $50,000 for alleged libel brought by his nephew, Percy D. Hillis of Victoria, B. C. This action is based on alleged newspaper interviews with Dr. Hillis published in The Portland Oregonian and a Brooklyn newspaper. The pastor was quoted as saying that he had assumed large financial obligations in order to make good to others losses which they had suffered through the failure of a business enterprise of his nephews. The nephews also operated in timber lands in British Columbia. Percy D. Hillis complains that he had been damaged by the statements attributed to his uncle, which he brands as "false and malicious." The complaint in the action was filed on Oct. 13, and the defendant has until Nov. 3 in which to answer.

BLAMES THE SEAMEN'S LAW.

India House Would Let President Suspend Bad Features.

Governors of India House, a downtown club of business men interested in foreign trade development, made public yesterday the report of a special committee appointed to study the probable effect of the seamen's law on American shipping. The committee reported that the onerous conditions under which American vessels were operated before the measure was passed would be increased by it. Recommendations were made that parts of the law be held in abeyance until conditions brought about on the high seas by the war had become more nearly normal, and that no effort be made to change the status of maritime procedure until hostilities come to an end. The recommendations were prepared in this form:

It is recommended:

(1) That authority be conferred on the President of suspend the operation of such of the provisions of the Seamen's act as he shall consider detrimental to the public interests until the entire subject of the development of the American merchant marine can be dealt with on a basis of permanency;

(2) That Congress create a permanent Shipping Board, composed of men experienced in shipping and in foreign trade, with authority to investigate all shipping problems and to submit to Congress recommendations for legislation covering the following subjects:

(a) The revision, amendment, or appeal of the Seamen's act.

(b) The revision of the navigation laws and rules and regulations based thereon.

(c) The establishment of regulations concerning the structural strength, equipment, and load line of vessels.

The committee of inquiry included J. P. Grace, President of W. R. Grace & Co.; P. A. S. Franklin of the International Mercantile Marine Company, George S. Dearborn of the American-Hawaiian Steamship Company, S. S. Norton of Norton, Lilly & Co., Minor C. Keith of the United Fruit Company, Welding Ring of Mailler & Quereau, J. Parker Kirlin, and S. G. Schemerhorn.

WILSON ON CHURCH WORK.

President to Address Federal Council on Dec. 10.

President Wilson is to go to Columbus, Ohio, on Dec. 10 to speak at the annual meeting of the Executive Committee of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ. His address will cover two unique forms of Christian effort. One is the co-ordinating of the work of many national organizations in Protestant churches, and the other is Christian work in rural communities. Both of them are being pushed by the Federal Council of Churches, and both are new forms of its work.

The co-operative plans of organizations have been given the ambitious title of "Christian Conquest of America." Fred B. Smith of the Men and Religion Movement is Chairman of it, and Executive and Field Secretaries are already at work.

Clifford Pinchot is head of the country life department of the Federal Council, and its Executive Secretary, the Rev. Charles O. Gill, has been making a survey of the State of Ohio to find out especially what rural churches are doing and what they might do. This survey is to be ready for presentation in advance of President Wilson's address.

NOTHING more forcefully illustrates "Progress" than the rapid growth of the GIMBEL Store in New York.

In five years this store has solidly entrenched itself in the public's confidence and builded a business millions of dollars in excess of that annually done by stores founded generations ago in the metropolis.

"Progress" at every step symbolizes the growth of the GIMBEL Store—a store of ideas, ideals and ACTION!

From the first hour that this GIMBEL Store was planned "Progress" has been constantly associated with it.

"Progress" was one of the foundations of the first GIMBEL Store more than seven decades ago. And no GIMBEL enterprise has ever been dissociated from that word of spirit of endeavor and action.

As one of the founders of the New York GIMBEL Store recently said at a meeting attended by other members of the firm and executive heads:

"November is to be distinguished by a sale for PROGRESS. It is not to be the style of sale for the purpose of being able to announce your having a sale, but because it is based on merits worthy of special attention on part of the public."

And there you have one of the fundamental reasons for the success of the GIMBEL Store—"based on merit."

What else but "Progress," energy, endeavor, "based on merit," could rear such a magnificent store, stock it with $6,000,000 worth of new merchandise, and command such a vast and steadily increasing patronage?

"Progress" in every thought and act!

Thoroughly modern in even the smallest detail, as thoroughly efficient as human endeavor, constant and sincere, can make it; wholly representative in its merchandise, and employing a system of pricing that makes it profitable for people to purchase here, it is not surprising that the GIMBEL Store should make such resistless headway in a field that presented seemingly insurmountable obstacles.

Out of the amazing activities of October, the month of GIMBEL "Fifth Birthday" Sales, into November, a month brilliant with the promise of still greater achievements, still broader and more ambitious sales plans, justifies, we believe, the GIMBEL claim that "Progress" is the spirit of the Store.

Welcome, November, at GIMBELS.

JOHNSTON LEADS TENNIS RATING

Newcomers Likely to Replace Veterans—Ranking Committee Has Hard Problem.

McLOUGHLIN THIRD IN LIST

Alexander Goes Up a Couple Notches — Behr Ranks Ahead of Pell.

NEW NAMES IN FIRST TEN

Pell, Griffin, and Niles Take the Places of Fottrell, Murray, and Clothier.

TENNIS RANKING.

1915. (Probable.)	1914.
1—W. M. Johnston.	1—M. E. McLoughlin.
2—R. N. Williams, 2d.	2—R. N. Williams, 2d.
3—M. E. McLoughlin.	3—K. H. Behr.
4—Karl H. Behr.	4—R. L. Murray.
5—T. R. Pell.	5—W. J. Clothier.
6—F. B. Alexander.	6—W. M. Johnston.
7—C. J. Griffin.	7—G. M. Church.
8—N. M. Niles.	8—F. B. Alexander.
9—W. M. Washburn.	9—W. M. Washburn.
10—G. M. Church.	10—Ella F. Fottrell.

Newcomers will likely replace many of the veterans in lawn tennis rating for 1915, although the most important changes will come after the first ten players have been selected. The Ranking Committee of the United States Lawn Tennis Association has already commenced its labors, and perhaps no Ranking Committee in the history of lawn tennis in this country ever has been confronted by quite the same proposition that confronts Walter Merrill Hall, Frederick C. Inman, and Walter L. Pate, who will pass on the relative merits of the players for the past year.

The policies which they adopted last year to base their ranking of players upon was sharply criticised by the general sporting public and heartily indorsed by the tennis world. The basis of the burning question was whether ranking should be based on season's play or on the showing displayed in one special tournament of a national character.

The policy of basing its ratings on the Summer's record was indorsed by the National Association. Now the question is whether the committee will carry with it at the meeting in December the strength of its 1914 convictions.

The most significant feature of the committee's report will be the many new names in the first thirty ranked players, for the old school players are slowly dropping out of competition and their places are being taken by the younger element, not quite so well known to the general public.

Until last year the winner of the Newcomers' tournament was placed at the top, but the poor showing of Williams in the international tournament and the great victories of McLoughlin over Brookes and Wilding, who had beaten Williams, influenced the committee to break the unwritten law and place McLoughlin ahead of the Philadelphian in the 1914 lists.

It was not contemplated then that complications would follow this precedent, but, with the present conditions so closely resembling those of 1914, the result will be watched with interest. W. M. Johnston won the national championship at Forest Hills, but his record for the season is far below that of Williams and McLoughlin, and this has raised the novel suggestion of placing all three in one class and bracketing them in one group in alphabetical order. This, however, would only be a partial solution, and chance would place Johnston at the top, with McLoughlin second and Williams third.

It is probable that Johnston's wonderful showing in the nationals in beating all four of his closest rivals in succession will entitle him to first honors. Five days after he defeated Williams in the nationals Johnston lost to last year's title holder on the same court and under exactly the same championship conditions.

Neither Williams nor McLoughlin lost a match to any other player during the season, except to each other or to Karl H. Behr, who was considered absolutely first class. Williams in this way lost three matches.

The only serious challenger of McLoughlin's rating is Karl H. Behr, who beat the Californian at Seabright.

The fact that T. R. Pell defeated the champion at Southampton in straight sets will influence the Ranking Committee in making its selection. Pell came through to the semi-final round, when he fell before McLoughlin. His season's record favors his selection for fifth place.

Next in order unquestionably comes Frederick B. Alexander, who will probably jump two places over his last year's standing. He won from N. W. Niles and took a set from McLoughlin. The international veteran was brilliant and effective and at times played better than he ever did before. Clarence J. Griffin, another youngster from the Pacific Coast, will probably be selected to fill the seventh position. Among Griffin's victims in the national tournament were: C. S. Garland, Sidney Thayer, Jr., Ward Dawson, and B. C. Law.

Boston's sole representative in the first ten appears to be N. W. Niles, whose chief performance was his victory over Johnston at Longwood, three sets to one. Watson M. Washburn will probably take ninth position, due to his defeat of G. M. Church in the nationals, while the latter is expected to bring up the rear. In this event Church will be dropped three numbers, Washburn remains stationary, and Niles comes up from Class 1.

The year of 1915 will be long remembered among the tennis players for the number of old school players who failed to figure with any degree of prominence. A shakeup in the national rating is not felt so much in its reaction on the first ten men as in the second and third groups. As a rule the leaders are so far superior to the average tournament competitor that it takes a big slump to cause them to be ousted. The past year has seen the younger element decisively defeat some of the hanging-on veterans.

Such youngsters as Leonard Beekman, and Harold A. Throckmorton, the former and present national interscholastic champions respectively, have splendid records for the Summer and should move up into Class 1.

COLGATE HUMBLES YALE ELEVEN—PRINCETON DEFEATS WILLIAMS—RUTGERS A WINNER

COLGATE UNBEATEN AFTER YALE GAME

Blue Outclassed All Through by New York State Lads—Eli's Third Defeat.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., Oct. 30.—A keen spirit of bitterness pervades the Yale campus tonight tempered by no promise of a better tomorrow. The red jerseyed sons of Colgate this afternoon completed a story of Yale football tragedy that has never before been equaled. Imbued with a confidence derived from a victory over the Army, they invaded the big bowl this afternoon and administered another defeat to Yale just when the Blue was hoping, rather than believing, that the tide was turning for them, that Yale had done with being humiliated. The men from Hamilton triumphed in a glorious battle by a score of 15 to 0, and another count was all but within the grasp of the New Yorkers when the whistle blew for the close of the game.

During the last period, the light steadily waned, darkness descending as if it sensed the calamity that was Yale's and in kindly spirit wished to blot it from view. No other team in the history of Yale has become such a close associate of disaster as that of this season, which has lost three games to minor elevens, and there are few who dare predict the future.

There were no accidents in Colgate's winning. The men came here with but one thought, and that of victory, and they played fiercely for the prize. The Blue fought back, sometimes with a brilliance that shattered Colgate's defense and sometimes with only the skeleton of hope to build upon. But when all is said Yale was outplayed completely, taking the game in its entirety.

Colgate Gets Early Lead.

At the end of the first half Colgate was leading by a score of 6 to 0, and it was evident even then that Yale was to fall before the powerful aggression of Colgate. But Yale men were not convinced. They still hoped that Yale's vaunted pluck in many a gridiron battle might in some miraculous manner come to the rescue and between the halves they sang their songs with an abandon that, if songs could do such things, would have spurred Yale to mighty deeds. They sang the undertaker song just as if it might not be held to apply to themselves. But that they realized the seriousness of the situation was indicated just before the teams came on the field for the second half when "Bright College Years" reverberated against the unsympathetic concrete of the Stadium. That is a song which has been the battle cry in the big games of the past when Yale's cohorts were going down to defeat and Colgate today brought it forth in all its ardor to the final ending, "For God, For Country, and For Yale."

But Yale was beaten. No one knew it better than the Yale men who were fighting Colgate. The Hamilton team held back the knowledge for just a few minutes, for the first touchdown came after four minutes of play, and came unexpectedly, before the big crowd realized that the game was fairly started. At the opening it seemed that there might be some spirit of accomplishment that would help the Blue. There were changes in the line and in the backfield, and it appeared that they were to work better than the combinations that have played in previous games. The men stood the strain of the first assault well. Their defense displayed the elements of cohesive action. And then, just as Yale was beginning to hope, the crash came. Colgate had advanced about 12 yards, and when the Blue line refused to give way and a forward pass was the resort tried by Colgate, Anderson stepped back of the line, and an instant later the ball was in flight over the line of scrimmage. It was a long pass, accurately directed into the waiting arms of Nelson. A Yale man stood right beside him, but was not quick enough to intercept the pigskin or to make the tackle, and Neilson was flying down toward the Yale goal. Wilson and Scovil started in pursuit, but the Hamiltonian dropped each with a straight arm, eluded several other would-be tacklers, and crossed the line. That score sealed Yale's fate. It sapped the confidence of the men that they were about to redeem themselves, and they fought to the end with the shadow of defeat following them in every play.

Playing Straight Football.

Colgate was playing straight football for the most part. There was little forward passing, the backs seeking out the vulnerable places in the Yale line, which proved to be outside of tackle on both sides, and they plunged through for repeated gains. Anderson played a wonderful game at quarter back, driving his men with a precision and judgment that reminded one of Huntington, a Colgate quarter back of two years ago, who was instrumental then in defeating the Blue. He was a part of every play. It had been expected that he would use the open game that Colgate played against the Army but that was relegated for a type of football that took much from the old and little from the new. It was not until the final quarter that Colgate opened a volley of forward passes and they were not then as effectual as the two tried during the first period, both of which were successful and gained a total of forty-eight yards.

The lateral pass that Yale tried with such success last year, due, perhaps, to its novelty, was not called into being but twice during the game this afternoon, and in each of those instances it was unsuccessful. The Blue warriors seemed content to match their strength against Colgate on the basis of straight football, but there was not the power to carry it through successfully. The Colgate line in many instances proved unable to withstand the attacks of Wilson and it was utterly unable to cope with the dashing assault of Scovil, but sustained action was not a part of the Blue repertoire.

Abel and West were the two linesmen around whom the Colgate offense formed. They were fiercely contesting in offense and powerful in defense. They opened up big holes for the backs to tear through when the Hamilton men were beating back Yale toward her own goal line. Baldridge and Way could not oppose them successfully, and it was not unusual to see Spencer or one or the other of the Colgate backs break through leaving a trail of fallen players streaming out behind them.

The loss of Legore told heavily against Yale. There was no punter among all of Yale's men. The kicks went high but seldom far, and there were those that were so miserably placed that the Blue gained but a few yards because they had been sent out of bounds close to the point from which they started. But Colgate was not much better off. Except that it had several men who could punt equally well, or bad according to the point of view. But the evenness in this particular lent itself to leaving the game an open test of force more like the football of years ago. Line-up

VICTORY FOR LAFAYETTE.

Penn Fumbles and Runs Off Plays Poorly.

PHILADELPHIA, Oct. 30.—Pennsylvania met defeat on the football field today for the third time this season, her conqueror this time being Lafayette. The score was 17 to 0. It was a crushing blow for the Quakers.

Pennsylvania carried the ball about four tiems as far as Lafayette. Her power was almost irresistible, but she lost through fumbling and bad judgment in running off plays. The Pennsylvanians made fifteen first downs in the game to Lafayette's four.

Lafayette scored early in the first period, when Pennsylvania fumbled and the Easton team recovered. Lafayette, failing to make an impression on the line, Lake kicked a field goal from Pennsylvania's thirty-five-yard line. In the second period Quarterback Berry, of Penn, fumbled a punt, and Scott, of Lafayette, scooping up the ball on the run, sprinted forty-five yards for a touchdown.

In the final period Bell, substituting for Berry, also fumbled a punt and Lafayette secured the ball in midfield. Lafayette, failing to gain, punted for a touchback. Then Bell punted straight up in the air for no gain. With the ball down the field for long distances, Pennsylvania's 25-yard line, made a forward pass to Scott on the 5-yard mark and the latter was over the goal line for a touchdown before Penn could intercept him

Pennsylvania repeatedly carried the ball in Lafayette's hands, Nelson on Twice they lost it on downs and several times it was lost near Lafayette's goal on fumbles. Once Penn had the ball on Lafayette's 3-yard mark with one down to go. She chose to try for a touchdown with a forward pass, but Lafayette prevented a score by spoiling the throw. Twice during the game Berry signaled for a free catch with no opposing players near him. In one of Pennsylvania's marches down the field she had the ball on Lafayette's 26-yard line and lost half the distance to her own goal when Hopkins, Pennsylvania, was put out of the game for slugging. Both teams were frequently penalized for holding. The line-up:

DARTMOUTH WHIPS AMHERST

Rushes of Green Team Too Much for Lighter Eleven.

Special to The New York Times.

AMHERST, Mass., Oct. 30.—Outweighed and outplayed after holding Dartmouth to a 0-to-0 tie in the first half, Amherst eleven weakened in the final periods and suffered a 26-to-0 defeat at the hands of the Green team. With a weight advantage of twenty pounds to the man, Dartmouth launched four attacks upon the Amherst goal in the first two periods, only to lose the ball each time when well into Amherst territory. In the second half, however, superior weight told. The Amherst line weakened under the pounding of the heavy Dartmouth backs and the first touchdown was scored. In the final period with several men on the bench from injuries and the eleven fast weakening under the Dartmouth attack the Amherst line failed to hold, and three more touchdowns brought the total points to 26 to 0.

BROWN PUTS VERMONT OUT.

So Many Players Hurt Game Has to be Called.

Special to The New York Times.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Oct. 30.—Brown found Vermont the easiest sort of an opponent this afternoon and with the play never in its own territory piled up a score of 46 to 0.

The visitors appeared to be in poor condition and owing to their frequent injuries time was constantly being called throughout the game, which was called before the last quarter was half over. Dolphin, who during the time he was in the game, proved Vermont's best player, was removed from the field during the third quarter in an unconscious condition, and for a time it was feared thot he had been seriously injured. He was later taken to a local hospital, where it is reported that he is suffering from a slight concussion of the brain.

PRINCETON ROUTS WILLIAMS, 27 TO 0

Second Line Team Has Easy Time and Harvard Scouts Are Disappointed.

Special to The New York Times.

PRINCETON, N. J., Oct. 30.—The Tigers took things easy this afternoon, and without using much pressure Williams was easily defeated at the Palmer Stadium by a score of 27 to 0. Five of the Princeton regulars were out of the game, Captain Glick, Highly and Brown, the ends, and McLean, the big tackle, visiting friends in Cambridge, while Dave Tibbott, the speed boy of the Orange and Black backfield, sat huddled in a blanket on the side lines and had a good rest.

It was an afternoon of good exercise for the Tigers' second string talent, and if the group of Harvard scouts who looked on expected to see Princeton uncover any of the tactics which they expect to spring on the Crimson next week they went home disappointed. Princeton showed nothing but the simplest kind of plays, and the game was not half over before Williams had been battered enough to permit these to work successfully.

A whole troop of substitutes got a chance to romp around in the stadium and there never was a time when Williams looked dangerous enough to make the "subs" think that they couldn't dispose of them just as well as the absent 'Varsity eleven. For two periods Williams held the Princeton defense at a standstill. The Tigers got a touchdown in the second period, when they grabbed a fumble on the six-yard line and quickly shoved the ball across. The defense of the second string men was not put to much of a test by the Williams team, for the attack of Coach Fred Daly's green eleven was comparatively weak. In the first two periods, however, the teams were aggressive and alert and three times prevented the Princeton players from getting a score when it was just within their grasp.

Princeton gained speed as the game wore on, and after scoring a second touchdown in the second period by a steady march of thirty-five yards down the field, jamming Williams back ten yards at a clip, the Tigers finished the contest with an outburst of speed in the final period which took away whatever bit of ambition Williams had left.

New York Boy Scores.

Williams gave the Tigers a scrap just before the end of the game when Overton shot a 20-yard forward pass to Laplant, the Williams end, who raced about forty yards before he was tumbled to the turf on the 5-yard line. Here was a gorgeous chance for Williams to score, but the Tiger defense tightened like a vise and the opposition was so stiff that Jones, the Williams quarter back, fumbled, and Princeton recovered the ball. The prettiest piece of work in the Tigers easy victory this afternoon was contributed by Billy Moore, who used to play with De Witt Clinton High School over in New York. They gave the ball to Billy in the last period on the 42-yard line for a plunge into the left side of the Williams line. As the speedy back was going into the line he noticed Laplant, the Williams end, had eluded the Princeton players, whose duty it was to box him, so he had to take matters into his own hands and shift his system of navigation. Moore stopped short and took a short run backward. He hid behind the Princeton interference until all the Williams defenders had been attracted to the other side of the line. Then he darted to the opposite end of the line of scrimmage, and a clear field awaited him. Down the field he sped with the Williams team in full chase. He outraced them all and made a touchdown after the most spectacular gallop of the game.

Williams was handicapped by a poor kicker. Overton, who did the booting for the Williamstown eleven, couldn't kick with the wind or against it. Driggs punted well for the Tigers, and one time, when he had the wind with him, he booted the ball nearly 70 yards over the line.

Jimmy Knox, the head of the Harvard scouts, had his field glasses trained on Princeton all the time, and he also had a notebook with him and a pencil. He didn't have much to write, as the Tigers stuck to primary football tactics, and not once did they have to resort to any unusual play to gain their ground. Gilman and Watson of the Crimson eleven were with Knox, and watched the Tigers with interest, but neither of them saw anything which will aid them next week.

Eddie Shea Tiger Star.

Eddie Shea was the most active man in the Princeton backfield. In the last period he met with quite a serious accident—without being injured, however, in the least. As he was tackled by a Williams player Shea's moleskins did not hold as well as the tailor said they would. It was a question of strength between the football pants and the Williams tackler. The moleskins finished a poor second. Shea, with rare resource, tumbled over on to the grass, and for a while everybody thought thta he was hurt. He wore too broad a grin for an injured man, however, and he sent a message to the side lines. Trainer Keene Fitzpatrick rushed to Shea's aid, but not with bandages and his medicine kit. He carried out the biggest blanket he could find and completely surrounded Shea with it. Shea proved to be a lightning-change artist, and on the very next play he carried the ball, smashing 15 yards through the Williams line.

Early in the game, after Overton had punted the ball to Princeton at midfield, the Tigers started a rush down the field, but were very much surprised as Williams held them for downs on the forty-yard line. Princeton soon got the ball again and started a steady march down the field to the five-yard line. Buzz Law was hurled into the line and fumbled, Laplant bouncing on the ball. Princeton did not have another chance for a score in the first period.

Overton threw a forward pass to Laplant which netted ten yards, but then Overton was forced to kick, Ames getting the ball on his own forty-yard line. Driggs with the wind kicked the ball over the goal line and it went to Williams on the twenty-yard line. Wright tried to penetrate the Tiger line, but was tossed back for a loss. Jones fumbled on the next play and Lamberton recovered the ball on the six-yard line. Law carried it over in two rushes, and also kicked the goal. The second touchdown came in the third period when the Princeton team got together and showed a steady consistent attack before which the Williams line fell back five and ten yards at a clip. The Tigers swept the Williams team backward for thirty-five yards and Law smashed through for another touchdown and kicked the goal in the bargain.

Princeton rushed in half a dozen substitutes in the final period, which started with Williams rushing the ball from her own twenty-two-yard line. Princeton gained on an exchange of kicks and then began another march down the field. Moore and Driggs made big gains repeatedly until the ball was on the five-yard line. Moore tore through the Williams line for another touchdown and Shea missed the goal.

More Princeton substitutes were sent into the game and Williams was tiring fast. Williams tried a freak play with the forwards strung across the field, but the play was promptly smeared. Overton got away two forward passes to Laplant, which gave the Williams team about thirty yards, but then they tried a number in quick succession and they all failed. Princeton took the ball on the forty-second-yard line, and then Moore ripped off his long zigzag run for a touchdown, Love kicking the goal.

It was the best day the Princeton substitutes have had this season, and they are saying tonight that it was just their luck that Coach Speedy Rush would have to be up to Cambridge and did not see them when they were at their best. Princeton is rather proud of this team, and the thing that they are trying to avoid between now and the Harvard game on Saturday is that insidious influence called overconfidence which sometimes raised the Old Nick with a high-tensioned football team at this stage of its development.

EXETER WINS EASY GAME.

Defeats Princeton Freshmen by Score of 30 to 0.

Special to The New York Times.

EXETER, N. H., Oct. 30.—Exeter today defeated the Princeton freshmen team 30 to 0, scoring three touchdowns in the first period. Kempton ran the kick-off back 80 yards, Campbell following with as long an end run. Five rushes enabled Donnelly to score. Five passes by Donnelly to Braman and Crane netted the other scores in this period. After Davis had scored in the third, Coach Jones made many substitutions. In the final period Davis kicked a placement goal. He also ran 65 yards for a touchdown, nullified for holding. George and Lamarche excelled for Princeton. The former twice tried field goals and once gained a clear field save for Davis, Exeter's star. A rib injury will probably disable Donnelly for a week or more.

DENVER, Col., Oct. 30.—The All-American baseball team resumed its winning streak in an interesting game here this afternoon when they defeated the All-National aggregation by the score of 6 to 4. The teams are made up from several clubs in both the American and National Leagues, and are touring the West.

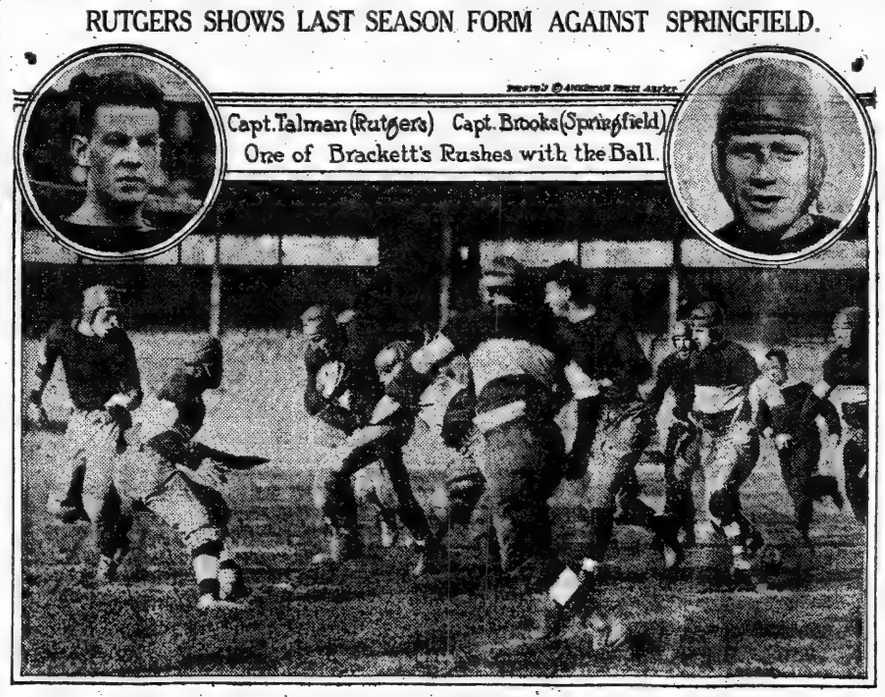
Umpire Kane Dies Suddenly.

LOUISVILLE, Ky., Oct. 30.—Stephen Kane, formerly a widely known National League baseball umpire, and later with the American Association and Federal League, was stricken with a heart attack and died in a hotel here today. Kane was 48 years old. His last employment was with the Ohio State League.

Toronto Retains Manager Clymer.

TORONTO, Ont., Oct. 30.—Manager Bill Clymer will have charge of the Toronto International League ball team again next season, the Toronto Club today having accepted his terms. Some days ago Clymer wrote asking for a decision on the matter so that he could give Louisville, which city was after his services, an answer. He preferred coming back to Toronto, he said.

RUTGERS SHOWS LAST SEASON FORM AGAINST SPRINGFIELD.



Capt. Talman (Rutgers) Capt. Brooks (Springfield)
One of Brackett's Rushes with the Ball.

RUTGERS SMOTHERS SPRINGFIELD Y.M.C.A.

Sanford's Jersey Youngsters Roll Up Score of 44 to 13 Against New Englanders.

George Foster Sanford's football machine from Rutgers College overwhelmed the representatives from the Springfield Y. M. C. A. College yesterday on the Federal League grounds at Harrison, N. J., and won by the score of 44 to 13. While there is general rejoicing in the Rutgers Camp it is mingled with regret that the game was not played against Yale instead of Springfield, as the latter held the New Haven team to a 19 to 0 score, and as one of the touchdowns made by the Massachusetts team was a palpable fluke the followers of Rutgers arrived at a mathematical deduction that under the conditions their favorites would have scored a victory over Yale.

While the Rutgers team played an improved game there was quite a little left to be desired, and had the New Englanders availed themselves of the mistakes of the opposing players their score would have been more imposing. Rutgers lost considerable distance through penalties, but the Sanford line was so strong that only one of the touchdowns scored against it was earned. Even this was quite a creditable piece of playing on the part of the Springfield players as only two other teams have accomplished this during the season; these were Princeton and Muhlenberg.

The superiority of the Rutgers team was apparent from the outset. It was the Sanford style of play in which the tackles and backfield were frequently requisitioned to carry the ball. Not more than three times did Rutgers attempt a forward pass, while the open style of play was not attempted until the margin of points in favor of Rutgers was sufficiently large to warrant the frequent exchange of punts. But even at this Rutgers always held a commanding advantage, gaining ground on every exchange. Only three times during the game did Springfield make fourth down through the line, and on these occasions there was little to spare after the distance had been measured.

The Rutgers play revolved around Captain Talman, who scored two touchdowns and kicked six goals, including one from the field; Bracher, who twice carried the ball over the line and aided in breaking up a number of the opposing plays, and Austin. This trio seldom failed to accomplish what they set out to do and carried the brunt of the line plunging and ground gaining for the New Jersey team. Cooper and Sermon figured prominently for Springfield. Cooper made the two touchdowns for his team, while Sermon made one of the touchdowns possible by securing the ball on a fumble and following with a pretty end run which placed the ball on the Rutgers' five-yard line, which resulted in Cooper making the touchdown.

The first two periods showed Rutgers in the best scoring mood and Springfield in the worst. With the opening of the second half the New Englanders showed a marked improvement in their game, but this was largely due to the use of several substitutes by Rutgers, as Sanford preferred to save his man after making victory a centainty.

Perhaps the poorest exhibition of football during the game was Springfield's efforts to advance the ball on forward passes. The attempts were frustrated through the alertness of the opposing players, who invariably anticipated the move and often collared the player designated to throw the ball before he could send it on its journey. There was an even break in luck, as each team scored a touchdown as a result of a fluky play. Rutgers tallied six points on a touchdown when the ball touched the leg of Miller, the Springfield quarter back, and rolled behind the line, where Austin fell on it. The Springfield touchdown was the result of a Rutgers player driving the ball directly into Cooper's arms as the latter was racing over the Rutgers' line to nail the player taking the kick. The line-up:

Rutgers.	Position.	Springfield.
Nash	Left tackle	Stine
Silker	Left guard	Long
Mason	Centre	Marvill
Garrett	Right guard	Purdy
Rendall	Right tackle	Griem

INTERSCHOLASTIC FOOTBALL

Fordham Prep Whips Brooklyn Prep by 20 to 14.

Fordham Prep defeated Brooklyn Prep 20 to 14 at Washington Park, yesterday afternoon, in a game that took two hours to play because of the time taken out for injuries. It was the first time in four years that the two prep. schools have opposed each other on the gridiron. Fordham greatly outweighed her opponents, and the Brooklyn team was unable to withstand the smashing attacks of the Fordham backs, and every few minutes time was taken out to allow some Brooklyn player chance to recover from the effects of Fordham's offensive.

Captain Frisch and Joe Williams, half backs on the Fordham eleven, were the big ground gainers for Fordham. In the third quarter Williams was taken out of the game when he was hurt, after being tackled, but resumed play in the fourth quarter after Brooklyn Prep had scored a touchdown and was ahead, 14 to 13.

A few minutes after Williams resumed play he hurled a forward pass 30 yards to Frisch, and the Fordham Captain went across the line for the touchdown that won for Fordham.

The big Flushing High School scoring machine added another big victory to its long record of wins by defeating Bay Ridge High School yesterday afternoon, 26 to 6. This was the first time that Flushing has been scored on this season.

Gettysburg Loses to Lehigh.

Special to The New York Times.

SOUTH BETHLEHEM, Penn., Oct. 30.—Lehigh found the Gettysburg line like unto a sieve today, and her backs oozed through almost at will or went around the ends for long gains, the final score being 29 to 0. Lehigh lost two chances to score from drop kicks. Cahall was Lehigh's star. Three brilliant runs were chalked up to his credit, two of them went for fifty yards each, and the third a dish of seventy-five yards in the third period for a touchdown. In making Lehigh's first score Boland performed a dazzling piece of work when Hoar fumbled on Gettysburg's twenty-yard line and the Lehigh half back scooped up the ball and was off for a twenty-yard dash. In working the forward pass Lehigh was exceptionally weak, only four out of fourteen attempts succeeding. Lehigh was the sufferer by penalties to the extent of forty-five yards.

Kick by Rosecrans Saves Day for Schenectady Team.

Special to The New York Times.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y., Oct. 30.—A drop kick from the forty-seven-yard line by Tubby Rosecrans defeated Rhode Island State in its game with Union here this afternoon. This was the longest kick yet made on Alexander Field and rivals the drop kick scored against Rensselaer Polytechnic last year by Rosecrans, also from the forty-seven-yard line.

Both teams played good football. Rhode Island State was forced to struggle within its own territory throughout the game but Union could not gain after advancing the ball to the visitors' twenty-yard line. Six times the Garnet team advanced to scoring distance of the Rhode Island goal and each time the Blue line held or fumbles occurred that caused the pigskin to change hands before a score was hung up. Toward the end of the game Union opened up and used the forward pass to good advantage. But lack of punch at the important moment in each case prevented any score. Girling clearly outpunted Le Boeuf of Rhode Island State. Once, with the wind at his back, the Union halfback lifted the ball from the twenty-yard line a clean sixty yards down the field, whence it rolled to Rhode Island State's two-yard line before being recovered.

It was in the third period that Union scored its three points. After Rhode Island State had advanced the ball from its own twenty-yard line for two first downs, Le Boeuf punted. The ball grounded and Goff, who picked it up, was dropped in his tracks. Immediately Girling returned the punt, standing on Union's twenty-yard line. The punt sailed sixty yards and rolled to Rhode Island's two-yard line. After three attempts to gain, Le Boeuf punted. Goff caught the leather on Rhode Island's thirty-five yard line. After Girling failed to gain on an end run Rosecrans dropped back to kick. The drop sailed prettily between the goal posts with feet to spare.

Rosecrans and Girling excelled in Union's backfield, while the work of Avila and Moynahan on the wings caused Rhode Island State to confine its attack almost exclusively to line bucks and skin tackle plays on double passes. O'Brien, at quarter, for Rhode Island, did the best work for the visitors.

The line-up:

Union. (3.)	Position. R. I. State. (0.)

Williams Wins Run from Union.

Special to The New York Times.

WILLIAMSTOWN, Mass., Oct. 30. — The Williams cross-country team easily defeated the team representing Union here this afternoon by the score of 16 to 42 over a muddy and hilly five-mile course. The race was easily won by Kelton, Captain of the Williams team; four of his teammates finished in the next five places. The first six men came in as follows: Kelton, Safford, Camp, and Leeming of Williams; Harvey of Union, and Hodge of Williams.

SYRACUSE BEATS MICHIGAN, 14 TO 7

New Yorkers Fumble Frequently, One Resulting in a Wolverine Touchdown.

ANN ARBOR, Mich., Oct. 30.—A powerful, but erratic offense and the weakness of the Wolverine line gave Syracuse University a 14 to 7 victory over the University of Michigan football eleven here today. Syracuse made many fumbles, two of which came when the Easterners had started marches toward Michigan's goal.

Twice during the first period Syracuse suffered 15-yard penalties for holding. Despite these setbacks and fumbles the Eastern athletes worked the ball to Michigan's 40-yard line before the quarter ended. In the second period Syracuse began a whirlwind attack. Kose broke through Whalen and sprinted forty yards for a touchdown. Wilkinson punted out and then made the goal. The power of the Syracuse backs then asserted itself. In five minutes Michigan's goal line was threatened. A six-yard end run by Meehan around Staatz resulted in a second touchdown. Wilkinson again punted out and goaled.

The third period was a pretty fight, with Syracuse claiming the margin. The ball was on Michigan's 18-yard line when Meehan fumbled and Benton recovered. There was little to choose between the elevens in the last quarter until the closing minutes of the play. The ball was generally near the centre of the field. Finally Syracuse added another fumble to an already large collection. Benton again grabb

HARVARD SLOW IN GETTING INTO ACTION

But When Its Scoring Machine Starts in Second Period it Beats Penn State, 13 to 0.

Special to The New York Times.

CAMBRIDGE, Oct. 30.—Penn State apparently had the Crimson team groggy in the first period of the game this afternoon and was still threatening to deliver the punch in the beginning of the second period, when they came a check. In a flash Harvard seized its opportunity and slipped over a touchdown wallop. Ewing dropped one of Mahan's punts on the Penn State 3-yard line, and then booted the ball over the goal line, where Parson fell on it for the score. Mahan kicked the goal, and the half ended with the score 7 to 0 in the Crimson's favor.

In the third period Harvard's machine, which is now said to have "found" itself, put on a series of ground-gaining plays, beginning at its 47-yard line, and without a let-up went over for its second touchdown. Mahan failed to kick the goal.

Although Penn State later in the game gave evidence of an ability to "come back" and showed up some holes in the Harvard line, it was unable to push its attack to a successful issue, and the game went to the Crimson 13 to 0. Last year's battle between the two teams ended with each team in possession of that number of points.

The team that Harvard put on the gridiron today and which succeeded in taking Penn State's measure, was regarded by the experts as Haughton's best offering, barring two players who were sent to Princeton. Gilman, who was injured in the Cornell game last week, but who is rounding into shape, and Watson, looked upon as the regular quarter back, watched the Tigers at Princeton.

Mahan, who played a fast game today, was withdrawn from the limelight as soon as Harvard's second score was completed. A little later Enwright, regarded as one of the best back field men in the game today, and who has been laid up with a tender knee for the past few weeks, was supported to the sidelines after he had been lifted from a scrimmage in which his knee was again injured. It is said, however, that the injury was not so serious as to prevent his appearance Saturday at Princeton as one of Mahans' running mates. Mahan's other back field companion today was King, who played an unusually fine game.

Following Harvard's kickoff at the beginning of the game Penn State in three plays drove the play well into Harvard's territory. The ball went over the line at the kickoff for a touchdown, and was put in play by Penn State on the 20-yard line. Clark went back apparently for a punt, but Yeager received it from centre and shot through the Crimson's right wing. He reached midfield before he was thrown by Wilcox. Berryman lost a yard, but Ewing, on the third play, pierced Harvard's centre and reached Harvard's 27-yard line before he was downed. Yeager made nine yards and then Clark made a first down on Harvard's 17-yard line. Harvard's hosts were dismayed and it began to look as is Haughton's charges were in a daze.

Yeager tired the line for no gain and Clark lost two yards. A forward pass netted five yards and then Ewing, standing on the 25-yard line, tried to drop-kick a field goal. The attempt was a poor one and the ball was recovered by Soucy and carried back to the 30-yard lin. Mahan punted and Penn State was penalized when it seemed to be under way again and Clark punted to Mahan on Harvard's 32-yard line. He ran it back thirty yards and, aided by King, pulled off several gains that placed the ball on Penn State's 28-yard line. A setback, occasioned by a penalty, led Willcox to try a forward pass. He slipped before he could get the ball away and Penn State took the pigskin on downs.

The team got under way for another series of short gains and was again in a position to score toward the end of the period. Mahan fumbled on Harvard's 40-yard line and a squad of Penn State men dropped on the ball.

Clark ripped off a 12-yard gain and followed it up with one of five yards. On the next play Yeager broke through and ran for a touchdown. Holding had been discovered in the line, however, and the ball was brought back just as the period ended.

Ewing started the second period with a forward pass, but Harte intercepted it and was downed on Harvard's 45-yard line. Harvard surrendered the ball on downs on Penn's 47-yard line, and Yeager, Berryman, and Ewing made it first down on Harvard's 40-yard line before Harvard began to stop them. Two forward passes were incompleted and Harvard took the ball on downs. Mahan sent a spiral down to Ewing and then followed the mishandling of the ball that turned the tide and developed into the Harvard score.

The third period was well started when Mahan took one of Clark's punts on Harvard's 30-yard line and ran it back 17 yards. Penn State's line gave way slowly under the Harvard attack, and in making first down Enwright was often used o a fourth down to make a matter of inches to complete the distance.

Finally a first down made made on Penn State's 6-yard line. King failed to gain, but in the next rush Mahan, with a wonderful burst of speed, dashed throug Penn State's left side and reached the line before he went down.

Harvard elected to play it safe for the rest of the game, although Penn State staged a series of forward passes in the gloom of the last moments of the final period that looked good to take the visitors across the line. The final pass, however, went over the line on a fourth down for a touchback. The summary:

Harvard.	Position.	Penn State.
Soucy	Left end	Higgins
Taylor	Left guard	Miller
Wallace	Centre	Painter

Parson	Right tackle	Czarnecki

MIDDIES DROP ANOTHER.

North Carolina Aggies Win by the Close Score of 14 to 12.

Special to The New York Times.

ANNAPOLIS, Md., Oct. 30.—The Naval Cadets again failed on the football field today when they lost a close game to the North Carolina Agricultural and Mechanical College by the score of 14 to 12. Failure to kick goals from touchdowns brought about the Middies' downfall, for had goals followed their touchdowns a tie score would have resulted. The Aggies scored in each of the first two periods, but were unable to cross the Navy line in the last two periods of play, while the sailors braced in the second half, and by aggressive play twice crossed their opponents' line.

Fumbling and blocked kicks played an important part in the contest, while at times both teams played good, straight football. The visiting players did not attempt a forward pass, while the Middies tried many times, though only occasionally effective. A strong wind favored the North Carolinans, who managed to secure the advantage of it most of the time, but much of this was lost through Bonner's delay in getting off his punts.

The visitors did their best work in the opening quarter when they received von Heinburg's punt on their own ten-yard line and carried it down the field for a touchdown without losing the ball. In the second quarter Bonner got the ball on Westphal's fumble and ran thirty yards for a touchdown.

In the third quarter Blodget recovered the ball on the third blocked kick against Bonner and ran twenty-five yards for a touchdown. In the final period the Aggies fumbled the ball and Martin, after a run of sixty yards, scored for the Navy. The line-up:

Fordham Polishes Up Team.

Although no regular intercollegiate game was played by the Fordham football team yesterday, it was kept very busy putting on the finishing touches for the tussle with Georgetown next Tuesday. A short, vigorous scrimmage was held, but most of the attention was devoted to correcting individual faults. McGuire is beginning to look like a regular fixture on the end as a result of his fine work during the past week. Yesterday he was still in Conklin's place on the left flank and accounted for two big gains on the scrub after taking Dunn's forward passes.

Following the scrimmage, which showed the Varsity line in almost perfect condition, Coach Vaughn took the players by pairs and started to polish off the rough spots on their play. Benson, who has supplanted Kane at left guard, got a thorough drill at low charging, while both the ends were initiated into the latest methods of tackling up interference. Captain Dunn assisted the Maroon coach, but confined all his attention to the backs. Cantwell and Yule were paired off on several forward pass combinations, while Butler and Dunn spent most of their time in practicing placement kicks. Following his lecture to the various men who will start against Georgetown, the coach kept them running through signals for over an hour.

Chicago Just Beats Wisconsin.

CHICAGO, Oct. 30.—Chicago today defeated Wisconsin, 14 to 13. A missed goal from touchdown accounted for the one point difference, for each team scored two touchdowns. There was much fumbling on both sides. The Badgers, except in one or two instances, failed to show the strong interference that has appeared previously. A costly fumble by Russell paved the way for the first Wisconsin touchdown, and the second was the result of a fifty-yard run by Simpson. Great dashes by Flood and Gordon gave the Maroons their first touchdown. The second came in the third period on a Wisconsin fumble, which a Chicagoan recovered on the Badgers' ten-yard line. Russell plunged over with the winning marker. Shull's steady toe gained the winning point.

W. and J. Wallops Muskingum.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Penn., Oct. 30.—Washington and Jefferson's goal line was crossed for the third time this season when Half Back Montgomery of Muskingum College, standing on his 25-yard line, intercepted a W. and J. forward pass at the end of the first period and ran seventy-five yards for a touchdown. The resultant goal gave the Ohio eleven 7 points, Washington and Jefferson making 41. Beginning with the third period, numerous W. and J. substitute entered the game, twenty-seven men in all being used. The final period, which produced two touchdowns by Folwel's men, saw W. and J.'s entire third team in action. W. and J. in al made six touchdowns and kicked five of the goals.

VILLANOVA BEATS ARMY TEAM, 16-13

Pennsylvania Eleven Outplays Cadets Both in Offensive and Defensive Work.

Special to The New York Times.

WEST POINT, N. Y., Oct. 30.—Villanova won a deserving victory from the Army eleven today in one of the hardest played and cleanest fought battles ever seen on the Plains. The final score was 16 to 13. The Pennsylvanians staggered the Cadets with an overhead attack that the Army lads were unable to cope with. Nor was this the limit of the Villanova offensive tactics. Double and triple passes, fake kick formations from which the runner, Ward, gained time and again, and delayed passes figured largely in the visitors' gains. Long and short passes rarely failed to make good. The Villanova defense gave perfect protection to the thrower, which was in strong contrast to the work of the Cadets' backs in their attempts to cover Murrill in his airline plays. Twice in succession Murrill was caught with the ball before he could get it away, far behind his line.

Villanova outplayed the Army at every turn except perhaps at the kicking game, in which Murrill excelled Ward. But the visitors didn't kick much, being content to fool the Army from start to finish with something new each time.

Ward was the star of the contest, his almost perfect passing and sensational running back of punts being the best ever seen here. In the second quarter, after Villanova had scored its first touchdown, Ward caught McEwan's kick-off on his own 5-yard line and ran through the entire Army eleven to the Cadets' 5-yard mark, a distance of 90 yards, where he was brought to earth by Britton. It was easy for Villanova then, for another short pass over the line of scrimmage gave them the touchdown.

Neither team scored in the first quarter, although the Cadets began what was their best display of offensive tactics toward the end of this period.

Securing the leather on their own thirty-yard mark they marched straight down to a touchdown on short gains through and off tackle, Ford and Hoge doing the bulk of the work. When Murrill's punt was caught at mid-field, Villanova began an air-line attack which took them to their first score. The first half ended with the score 13 to 7 in favor of the visitors.

At the opening of the second half the Army got away its best forward pass, a long toss of thirty yards, Murrill to Redfield, which put the ball on Villanova's eight-yard line. Ford took it over in two plays, but McEwan missed the goal and the score was tied. It was here that Ward flashed his sensational run, and with but a few minutes of the last period to play, Ward stood on the Army's thirty-yard line and kicked his team to victory when he dropped a beautiful goal from the field. The line-up:

Army (13.)	Positions.	Villanova (16.)
McEwan	Centre	Lynch

Lawrenceville Suffers Defeat.

Special to The New York Times.

LAWRENCEVILLE, N. J., Oct. 30.—Lawrenceville's clean record of not being defeated by a "prep." school team in four years was spoiled today when Blair Academy defeated them by the score of 14 to 7. Lawrenceville, although outweighted in all positions, put up a very strong game. Blair's game was featured by long forward passes, which Lawrenceville could not seem to fathom, and in the kicking game, in which she excelled. For three quarters Blair easily outplayed Lawrenceville, but in the fourth quarter Lawrenceville started a whirlwind attack which resulted in Milnes going over for a touchdown. Hunter, Scott, Minns, and Cueva excelled for Lawrenceville, while Brooks and Brenner played the best game for Blair Hall.

Hamilton Rolls Up Big Score.

The football team of Hamilton Institute scored a victory over the New Rochelle High School's eleven on the latter's gridiron at New Rochelle yesterday, winning by a score of 39 to 0. Hamilton outplayed their opponents at every stage of the game. The New Yorkers' backfield showed up in splendid form, and their forward line had little difficulty plowing through to six touchdowns. Cravat, the Hamilton Institute quarter back, scored his team from being scored upon when he recovered a fumble on his own five-yard line and ran the entire length of the field for a touchdown.

Hobart Trounces Clarkson Tech.

Special to The New York Times.

GENEVA, N. Y., Oct. 30.—Hobart College's football eleven scored a victory over the Clarkson Tech team in an interesting game here this afternoon by the score of 20 to 0. The local aggregation, although considerably outweighed by their opponents, played an offensive game from the start, and almost continuously had the ball in the Clarkson territory. Doty, Campbell, Smith, Jenekins, and Pickering were the chief factors in the Hobart victory.

Oregon Boys Win Smashing Game.

EAST LANSING, Mich., Oct. 30.—Smashing the local line by a surprise attack, the football eleven representing Oregon Agricultural College defeated the Michigan Aggies here today, 20 to 0. The team from the Far West had been represented as a brilliant exponent of open football. Instead, Coach Stewart's men used an old-fashioned battering-ram attack which resulted in three successful marches for touchdowns.

N. Y. U. Second Beats Pawling.

The New York University scrub football team defeated the Pawling eleven yesterday afternoon on the latter's grounds, by a score of 21 to 14. A stiff wind made it impossible for either team to use any open work plays, except for a few end runs from pick formations. Noonan, the Violet end, made two touchdowns and added three points by kicking an equal number of goals.

COLUMBIA'S FIRST TEAM.

Stuyvesant Fish, '71, Captain, and There Were Twelve Men on a Side.

The introduction of football at Columbia is described in the current number of the Columbia Alumni News and tells of the first team which played Rutgers at New Brunswick on Nov. 12, 1870. The college at that time was on Forty-ninth Street and the campus was so small that the players had little opportunity for practice. At that time, the student body numbered only 125 students.

The moving spirit in the formation of the football team was Stuyvesant Fish, '71, who was elected Captain. The team of twenty players practiced for some time before they received a challenge and finally one came from Rutgers. Rutgers won the game 6 to 0.

There was no scoring in the first half hour of play, so the two teams decided to abandon the rule which provided that the ball would have to be put through the goal posts to count a goal. It was decided to make the line bounding the ends of the field the goals, and in this way Rutgers was able to score.

The game was exceedingly rough and the players on both teams had sore shins after the contest was over.

Columbia gained quite a reputation because of that game and soon after they went to New Haven and had their first game with Yale.

The players on Columbia's first team in 1870 were Stuyvesant Fish, '71, Captain; Denning Duer, '71; Moses H. Epstein, '71; J. Herrick Henry, '71; Chester C. Munroe, '71; John Watts Russell, '71; William E. Falls, '71, Mines; Arthur D. Weekes, '72; Robert Arnold, '72; Valentine Mott, '72; Travers C. Van Buren, '72, Mines; H. Walter Webb, '73, Mines; Casimir de Rham Moore, '73; Percy H. McMahon, '73; Alexander B. Simmonds, '73; Gilbert M. Speir, Jr., '73; David Thompson, '73; Robert C. Cornell, '74, and E. I. Frost, '74.

Win Fifteenth Straight Game.

Kingsley School eleven at Essex Falls yesterday defeated the Horace Mann School team of New York by a score of 27 to 0. The victory was the fifteenth in succession for the New Jersey boys, who have not been defeated since 1912, and who have not bee scored upon thus far this season. Although outweighted many pounds to a man, the Kingsley representatives time after time hurled back the assaults of the heavy Horace Mann forwards and kept them from scoring on line plunges. The only noteworthy gains registered by the New Yorkers were made with forward passes, a number of which were successfully executed through the retrieving of Atwater, the visiting right end.

At no stage of the game did Horace Mann get within the danger zone. Kingsley's light ends ran rings around their opponents, and not only showed them up with speed but outguessed them at almost every opportunity.

Kingsley did not allow their visitors time to think in the first quarter, for two minutes after the opening whistle Marsh had carried the ball over the line for the first touchdown. Not long after this score, Fields, Kingsley's fleet half back, recovered a fumble on the Horace Mann 20-yard line and ran for a touchdown. Arnold went over for the third score in the second quarter on straight line plunging, and in the fourth period he counted again on an 8-yard plunge through tackle.

Illinois and Minnesota in Tie.

CHAMPAIGN, Ill., Oct. 30.—Football teams from the Universities of Illinois and Minnesota played a 6 to 6 tie here today. In the fourth quarter victory seemed in the grasp of Minnesota, when, on the fourth down, on a wild pass, the ball rolled down to the Illinois six-yard line, and a Minnesota player covered it. Minnesota advanced to the one-foot line, but the Illinois line held the visitors for downs and Macomber punted out of danger. Minnesota pushed the ball over the Illinois line for its score within a few minutes of play. In the second quarter Illinois strengthened its defense, and Halstrom's long sprint made it possible for them to score.

Metuchen Beats Holy Cross.

Special to The New York Times.

PLAINFIELD, N. J., Oct. 30.—The Holy Cross football team defeated the Metuchen team on the cricket field at North Plainfield this afternoon by a score of 14 to 0. The locals scored points in the second and third periods.

BASKET BALL IN FAR EAST.

Game Popular Among Chinese and Filipinos—Japanese to Play.

The progress of American sports in Far Eastern countries and South America is well shown by the growth of basket ball. Reports in Spalding's official guide book show that in South America, Hawaii, China, Porto Rico, and the Philippines the Winter sport is becoming as popular as baseball.

B. E. Wiggins, Supervisor of Athletics and Playgrounds, writes this about the sport in the Porto Rico public schools: "Prior to the Winter of 1913 basket ball was practically unknown here. It is true that there had been some activity in the girls' style of game at the Normal School and at Ponce, but the game as a sport remained quiescent because of the misconception that it was fit for girls only, and because there had been no organized efforts or capable instruction to develop its possibilities. Climatic conditions and the temperamental reluctance to engage in so strenuous a sport were also marked handicaps. The game's development since 1913 has been rapid. At the present time it is played in fifty of the school centres. It is played on clay courts in the open, because there are no covered courts. The game is improving the general type of physique, and is developing co-ordination and alertness and self-mastery."

Chinamen Play It, Too.

This report was made by J. H. Crocker, Secretary of the National Y. M. C. A. of China; "Basket ball was first introduced in China by Robert R. Galley of Princeton, at Tientsin in 1904. In 1908 the first basket ball league was formed. Basket ball was never popular until 1913, when Dr. C. A. Siler organized a league. The same year A. N. Hoagland of Princeton came to Peking as physical instructor for the Y. M. C. A., and in 1914 Dr. D. W. Walker arrived to teach in the Government schools at Tientsin. These men boosted basket ball until North China teams were superior to all others. The team representing China in the Far Eastern championships was selected entirely in the north.

"Basket ball is a strenuous game for the Orient, where the climate is hot and the humidity intense. Japan has not begun to play basket ball, but since she will hold the third Far Eastern championship games at Tokio in 1917, it is certain that the Empire will have a team in the next championship."

In the Philippine Islands are hundreds of teams. The Filipinos won the Far Eastern championship this year, and were far superior to all their rivals. The United States soldiers in the Philippines have done much to promote interest in the sport.

Of the game in South America, Jess T. Hopkins, Technical Director of the National Committee of Physical Education in Uruguay, writes that the most important event last year was the adoption of a uniform code of rules by delegates from the Y. M. C. A. in Argentina, Brazil, Chile, and Uruguay. The Y. M. C. A. is co-operating with the Basket Ball Union in furnishing coaches for teams. The game was a welcome addition to the recreation of a people whose most lively athletic game was soccer football, Mr. Hopkins says.

CORNELL CRUSHES VIRGINIA 'POLY'

Ithacans Keep Southerners Far Away from Their Goal Throughout Game.

Special to The New York Times.

ITHACA, N. Y., Oct. 30.—Cornell played close to form this afternoon in defeating the Virginia Polytechnic Institute by the score of 45 to 0. For the first time this year the Ithacans opened up something and from straight football in their offense they worked five perfectly executed forward passes from a compact formation and bewildered the Southerners by this form of attack. Cornell was never in danger, the Virginia team never getting beyond the Cornell 25-yard mark; although they made several first downs by sliding outside of tackle and by skirting right end.

The Ithacans were penalized frequently for getting off side, but their play on the whole was high class and stamped them as one of the best teams seen here in years.

Cornell scored two touchdowns in the first period, Barrett carrying the ball over, and early in the second added another by the use of straight football. Toward the end of the second period three forward passes took the ball from Cornell's 30-yard line over for a touchdown. Shelton and Eckley received Barrett's tosses on the first two attempts and then Barrett tossed the ball over the goal line to Eckley.

In the second half forward passes to Shelton and Collins took the ball from midfield to Virginia's 5-yard line, from which point Collins was hustled over for a touchdown.

Barrett, Collins, Mueller, and Shiverick took the ball for big gains and in the third period when the second team was substituted, the scrub backfield gave an even faster exhibition than did the 'Varsity. Schlichter, Shock, Kleinert, and Lewis did very good work. A feature was a touchdown by Cool, the Cornell centre in the third period. When the Ithacans reached the ten-yard line Barrett changed places with the Cornell pivot man and in the play Cool carried it over for a touchdown. Line-up:

Cornell	Position.	Virginia.
Cool	Centre	Moor
Anderson	Right guard	Treakle
Gillies	Right tackle	Parrish
Eckley	Right end	Hall
Barrett	Quarter back	Terris
Collins	Left half back	Embleby
Shiverick	Right half back	Powell
Mueller	Full back	Redd

Touchdowns—Cornell, Barrett, (2,) Shiverick, Eckley, Cool, Collins, Shock. Goals from touchdowns—Barrett, (3).

Substitutions.—Cornell—Ryerson for Shelton, Fisher for Jameson, McCormick for Fisher, McKeage for Miller, Snyder for McKeage, Brown for Cool, Carey for Brown. Bard for Anderson, Masson for Bard, Jewett for Gillies, Dixon for Jewett, Zander for Eckley, Shock for Barrett, Scallchter for Collins, Kleinert for Mueller, Lewis for Kleinert, Hoffman for Shiverick, Benedict for Hoffman. Virginia—Lybrook for Powell, Dixon for Embleby, Gregory for Cottrell, Henderson for Moor, Moor for Bopp, Gray for Moor, Powell for Parrish.

Referee—F. R. Gillespie, Pennsylvania. Umpire—F. W. Murphy, Brown. Head linesman—A. W. Risley, Colgate. Time of periods—Twelve minutes each.

Columbia's New Full Back.

Columbia football practice yesterday was light, following the hard scrimmage with the New York University eleven on Friday. Miller and Healey were drilled in field goals and kick-offs. This is a weak department of the Blue and White's play. In the last game only three goals were kicked after nine touchdowns. Coach Metcalf sprang a surprise by relegating Littauer to the scrubs and putting Monroe at full back on the Varsity. This was only temporary, and to train Monroe as a full back substitute, because Littauer's work in the St. Lawrence game left no doubt as to his ability. The Varsity line-up Saturday will be as follows: Left end, Reeder; left tackle, Healey; left guard, Kennedy; centre, Brown; right guard, Cleveland; right tackle, Donaldson; right end, Buermeyer; quarter back, Miller; left half back, Simonds; right half back, Wadleton; full back, Monroe.

The freshman football schedule has been announced, as follows: Nov. 6, Kent School, at Kent, Conn.; Nov. 12, Bay Ridge High School, on South Field; Nov. 19, Horace Mann School, on South Field; Nov. 24, Hamilton Institute, on South Field.

SIX IN HARKNESS CUP RACE.

Speedway Champions Expect to Make 125 Miles an Hour Tuesday.

For the first time motor racing and aviation will join football, golf, soccer, and fox hunts as Election Day sports. At the Sheepshead Bay Speedway six champion drivers will race for the Harkness Gold Trophy and $12,500 in prizes, and "Wild Bob" Burman will try for world's records with his Ormond Beach flyer, the Blitzen Benz. Before the speed contest Juan Demejos, the Brazilian aviator, will loop the loop in his aeroplane and attempt to fly around the course upside down. Then he will give an exhibition of aerial warfare, when he attacks a Stevens dirigible balloon with bombs.

The contestants for the Harkness Trophy Race will be Ralph De Palma, Dario Resta, Bob Burman, Johnny Aitken, Ralph Mulford, and Eddie Rickenbacker. De Palma will drive his Mercedes, the same car that won the Indianapolis race; Eddie Rickenbacker will pilot the Maxwell, winner of the Providence, Sioux City and Omaha speedway cups. The other four will contest for the latest classic trophy in Peugeots.

Such a field in a contest of only 100 miles will make the race a struggle from start to finish, without a stop for gasoline, tires or adjustments. The American record of 57:26, made by Resta in the first 100 miles of the Astor Cup Race, will surely be broken, and it is hardly less certain that the Brooklands track world's record of 56:29:93 will also go.

The big record attempt of the day, however, will be made by Bob Burman in the Blitzen Benz, in which, on April 23, 1911, on Ormond Beach, he set world's straightaway records. His times on that day were: 15 4-5 seconds for the kilometer, 25 2-5 seconds for the mile, and 51 1-5 seconds for two miles. Burman is confident that on Election Day he can travel at least two miles a minute.

Huey Retires from Billiards.

The announcement that William B. Huey of Chicago, who won the world's championship in three-cushion carrom billiards recently, had left the game, was a surprise to all billiard players. By his resignation Huey forfeited to Alfred De Oro, the three-cushion championship, since the Cuban player had challenged. The Chicago player's action was unexpected. He gave the pressure of business as his reason for retiring. Huey was an unbeaten champion, who had the distinction of being the only business man in the history of the game to win a world's championship billiard title. He rose from the position of an obscure amateur to be the monarch of the three-cushion game in less than seven months. He defeated a champion in George Moore, accomplishing the feat in a single match. He defeated two former champions in John Daly and De Oro in the Chicago tournament last Spring.

$1,000,000 Horse Sale in Argentina.

BUENOS AIRES, Argentine Republic, Oct. 30.—At the annual thoroughbred sale, which closed here today, the horses disposed of brought a total of $1,000,000. The highest price realized was $14,000.

CRESCENTS DOWN YALE.

Bay Ridge Soccer Players Too Speedy for the Collegians.

With strong wind blowing the length of the field, Yale's soccer players lost to the Crescent team at Bay Ridge yesterday afternoon by the score of 2 goals to 1. Playing with the wind in the first half, the Crescents clinched the victory by scoring twice, while Yale was blanked.

Yale's single tally came after thirty minutes of play in the second period, when Haskell, the centre half, sent in good shot from forty yards out which passed De Baum and went into the Crescent net. All othre shots for the Crescent goal, of which there were many in the second half, went wild or were carried well over by the force of the wind.

Fifteen minutes from the start Jackson, centre forward for the Crescent, took a pass from the right wing and placed the home team in the lead. Before half time Phillip, with the aid of McClelland and Jackson, put the Crescents two up. The line-up:

Yale, (1.)	Position.	Crescent, (2.)
Wells	Goal	De Baum
Crawford	Right back	Dodwell
Wood	Left back	Humphries
Booth	Right half	O'Rourke
Haskell	Centre half	Persenico
McCanse	Left half	Hamilton
Souther	Outside right	Taylor
Gay	Inside right	Pert
Tucker	Centre	Jackson
V. Lee	Inside left	McClelland

Referee—Frank Davis. Linesmen—Messrs. V. Boaz and H. Young. Goals—Jackson, Phillip, Crescent A. C.; Haskell, Yale. Substitute—M. Lee for McCanse, Yale. Time of halves—Forty-five minutes.

Richmond County defeated the Englewood Field Club by 3 goals to 0 in the Field Club League game at West New Brighton yesterday afternoon. The Jerseymen, who are an All-American team, played a plucky game, but lacked the experience of the home eleven.

Playing the champion team of the Overseas Wanderers for the first time this season in a Saturday Amateur League game, which opened the season at Lenox Oval yesterday, the eleven of the Columbia Oval Football Club notched a victory by the score of 5 goals to 2.

Keen rivalry marked the Saturday League championship game between the Central Y. M. C. A. and the Central Strollers at the Parade Grounds in Brooklyn yesterday, the former winning out after the hardest kind of a struggle by the score of 3 goals to 2.

Bensonhurst tried in vain to stop the victorious career of the rocoer eleven of the Staten Island Cricket and Tennis Club in the Field Club League game yesterday at Livingston, Staten Island won by 5 to 2.

HIGH SCHOOL SOCCER.

Evander Childs Surprises Commercial High in a Close Game.

Evander Childs surprised Commercial High in the High School Soccer League match at Commercial Field, yesterday and won a hard fought game by the score of 2 goals to 1. With the wind in their favor in the first half the home team was unable to break down the defense of the visitors. After the restart, with ends changed, good combination work took the ball down to the Commercial net, and from a mix-up Dorf shot the first goal of the game. Mouzan placed Evander Childs in the lead with a long shot, which the wind carried into Commercial's net. Three minutes before time was called Commercial received a penalty from which Camas scored a point for the losers. The line-up:

Commercial.	Position.	Evander Childs.
King	Goal	Singer
Camas	Right back	Simmons
McQuade	Left back	Bruckman
McKenna	Right half	Martin
Arrowitz	Centre half	A. Wolf

Referee—Mr. Barry. Linesmen—Messrs. Brass and Mathewson. Goals—Dorf, Mouzan. Evander Childs; Camas, Commercial. Time of halves—Thirty minutes.

ST. ANDREWS, HOME OF GOLF IN AMERICA—MARSTON VICTOR ON ATLANTIC CITY LINKS

WHEN JOHN REID BROUGHT GOLF HERE

First Played at Yonkers, but St. Andrews Is American Home of Game.

The beginning of American golf is usually set down as Nov. 18, 1888, when John Reid, the "Father of American Golf," joined with six other enterprising and enthusiastic gentlemen and formed the St. Andrews Golf Club. The real start was somewhat earlier. Robert Lockhart returned from his annual trip to Scotland in the Fall of 1882 and happening to meet John Reid on the street in Yonkers, he informed him that he had brought from Scotland some implements for playing a new game called "golf," and invited him to come to his residence and try the game in the back yard.

These two men constructed an impromptu six-hole course in a pasture belonging to H. O. Tallmadge, another resident of Yonkers. Tallmadge was invited to join the circle of players for three reasons—he was a good fellow, he became an enthusiast about the game, and he owned the golf course. The number of golfers at this time was perhaps half a dozen, and there were only fourteen or fifteen sticks in the country, all owned and used by this group. These sticks had rings of different color painted on them to distinguish the clubs of one player from those of another, and also to tell the clubs apart, for the players of those days were not so familiar with the variations between the putter and the driver as the present generation seems to be. The golf clubs of the old days were fearful and wonderful things, and four sticks were a good load for any caddie.

About 1888 the players had become too numerous for the pasture links, and a new six-hole course was laid out on the east bank of the Hudson River, where now some Yonkers manufacturing plant is running full blast. It was here that the famous "Apple Tree Gang" came into existence. The players derived this name from the fact that their clubhouse at this course was a verdant apple tree; its limbs were the clothes racks, its leaves were awnings, and its fruit provided the refreshment for the wearied players. Here were held the first tournaments, and here, to quote the Secretary of the new-born St. Andrews Golf Club, J. B. Upham, in the "second round Mrs. Reid and Upham won by one and one-half holes, and Mr. John Reid beat Robert Lockhart, 4½ to 2½." The John Reid Gold Medal was played for in 1889 and won by P. C. Myers. No player was forced to wear a high hat, but "Prince Alberts" were usually worn at tournaments.

In 1894 the game became so popular and the membership of the St. Andrews Golf Club so large that another change was made, and a course was laid out in the picturesque Sawmill River Valley, east of Yonkers, at a place called Grey Oaks. Many famous matches were played here, but the ever-increasing interest in the game forced the St. Andrews players to move to the present location at Mount Hope, where an eighteen-hole course was laid out that has remained almost unchanged to this day.

The roster of the club members reads like "Who's Who in America." Andrew Carnegie has the same advantage at St. Andrews that Francis Ouimet enjoys at Brookline. Both have cottages at the edge of the course, but the Laird of Skibo says his cottage must be of the wrong kind, as he cannot get the distance that Ouimet obtains. Edwin Gould owns the first four holes at Ardsley, but prefers to play his golf at St. Andrews. Certainly no one is better qualified to deliver a treatise on "The Psychology of Short Putts" than Nicholas Murray Butler. If a new hole is desired, there is Alfred Craven, Chief Engineer for the Public Service Commission, to lay it out, and Major John F. O'Rourke to construct it. If a loan must be floated to purchase a new rocking chair for the porch, George F. Baker, A. Barton Hepburn, Otto H. Kahn, Isaac Seligman, and Mortimer L. Schiff may be trusted to see that the movement is financially sound. Charles M. Schwab passes as an expert on steel-faced clubs, and John F. Stivers, former Chief Engineer of the Panama Canal, is invariably consulted before a new ditch is dug to trap a poor drive.

St. Andrews is not a country club, it is a golf club, and one of the oldest rules bars ladies out. The comfort of the members and the welfare of the course are remarkably well looked after. The first four holes on the top of the hill are watered all through the dry season from the pressure tank at the summit, and the valley holes are irrigated from the reserve tank, which also serves as an outdoor swimming pool, just off the dressing room at the club. Samuel A. Cunningham, Chairman of the Greens Committee, is an expert on grasses, and the whole course is as carefully groomed as the putting greens on most links.

Plans are under way to lengthen the course from the present 5,841 yards to 6,200 yards, with pits and bunkers to stiffen the play, and several objectionable features now in existence will be eliminated.

MRS. BARLOW TAKES CUP.

Philadelphian Wins First Round of Lakewood Invitation Golf Tourney.

Mrs. Ronald . Barlow of the Merion Cricket Club of Philadelphia won the chief cup in the invitation golf tournament for women on the links of the Country Club of Lakewood yesterday. She defeated Mrs. C. J. S. Fraser of Baltusrol by 7 up and 6 to play.

This is the second year in succession that Mrs. Barlow has achieved this distinction. Practically every match she has won has been by a comfortable margin. Mrs. Barlow took an early lead and was never headed.

An eighteen-hole medal play handicap was run off, but only half a dozen returned cards. Miss Gertrude Pickhard of Englewood was the winner with a card of 102—9, 93. The summary:

First Eight.—Final Round—Mrs. Ronald H. Barlow, Merion Cricket Club, beat Mrs. C. J. S. Fraser, Baltusrol Golf Club, 7 up and 6 to play.

Second Eight.—Final Round—Mrs. W. L. Seaman, Richmond County Country Club, beat Miss Elsa Pickhardt, Englewood Country Club, 2 up.

Third Eight.—Final Round—Mrs. Albert McDonald, Plainfield Country Club, beat Miss Mabel Guilford, Dunwoodie Country Club, 2 up.

Handicap—Miss Gertrude Pickhardt, Englewood, 102, 9—93; Mrs. George D. Boschen, Spring Lake, 112, 12—100; Mrs. Frederick A. Potts, Lakewood, 110, 7—103; Miss Grace Farrelly, Englewood, 117, 12—105; Mrs. R. W. Swan, Tatnuck, 124, 14—110.

NICHOLLS AND SMITH LOSE.

Hagen and McNamara Beat New Yorkers in Golf Match.

Spurred on by the fact that some real money was at stake, Walter Hagen, Massachusetts "open" golf champion paired with Tom McNamara, Western "open" champion, decisively won from Gilbert Nicholls, metropolitan "open" champion, and Alec Smith, former national "open" champion, by the margin of 6 up and 5 to play over the Wykagyl course yesterday. The match was played amid sprinkles of rain, flurries of snow, and a gale of wind. McNamara was in particularly fine form on his short approaches, and upheld his reputation as a deadly putter by holding all the short ones on which Nicholls and Smith fell down. In the entire thirty-one holes, Smith and Nicholls won only two holes and Alec Smith accounted for both of these, in spite of the fact that Nicholls tied for low score in the morning round with Hagen in 76 and had the lowest card of all four men in the afternoon with a 78. Playing the bye holes the local professionals reduced the margin by one hole, but that brought them no money. Of the eight holes won by Hogen and McNamara, each player accounted for four and the end of the day found them only one stroke apart, McNamara with 158 for thirty-six holes and Hagen with 157. A large gallery followed the match.

McNamara drew first blood by putting his third shot dead to the pin and sinking his putt for a 4 on a par 5 hole, while Smith sliced his second into a brook and Nicholls sliced his third to the right of the green. Hagen duplicated this feat on the next hole with a 300-yard drive, a long second, and an approach that left him little to do to win with a 4. On the fifth hole Smith sank a good putt for a 2, but Hagen rose to the occasion and did the same.

All the holes were halved until McNamara drove to the tenth green and holed out in 3, Smith and Nicholls failing short on the tee shot and missing easy putts, while Hagen was excavating in a sandpit to the left of the green. This left Hagen and McNamara 3 up, but on the next hole McNamara and Nicholls found the bottom of the brook on their second shot, and Walter Hagen did a little Fall ploughing on his second, leaving Smith the winner with a par 5.

On the sixteenth Hagen drove a cleek shot into the wind and got the green, while Smith was over in a pit, and both Nicholls and McNamara fell short. Hagen played safe and won the hole in 3, putting his side 3 up once more, and it remained this way for the morning round.

On the second hole in the afternoon round both Smith and Hagen drove 300 yards, but McNamara electrified the gallery by sinking a forty-foot putt from the edge of the green for a win with a 3. Smith had a poor third on the fourth green, compared to McNamara, but Smith stole the hole with a great putt, while McNamara took the regulation 5. Gil Nicholls and Hagen were on the seventh green on their tee shots, and Hagen took a 3, but on the shortest and easiest of putts Nicholls sent his ball right pas the cup and lost the hole, leaving his side 4 down. On the next hole Smith and Nicholls played par golf and each took 5, but Hagen and McNamara were still better, both players being on the green in 3 and taking 1 putt apiece.

On the tenth hole McNamara drove to the green once more and Hagen located the same pit that he discovered in the morning round. Nicholls dropped his tee shot dead just short of the green, and Smith was off to the right. Hagen was close up against the face of thte trap, but he cut at it savagely with a niblick and laid the ball dead to the pin on his second, and both he and McNamara took 3, winning the hole and leaving themselves 6 up and 8 to play.

Smith got on the rough on the eleventh and picked up on his third shot and Hagen did the same on his second when he finished his ball out of the brook. Nicholls drove a low brassie down the wind to the green for his second, and holed out in 4, but Tom McNamara laid another of his approaches close to the pin and halved the hole with him.

Alec Smith put his drive across the valley on the thirteenth within fifteen feet of the pin and holed out in 3, but once again one under par failed to worry McNamara, and he laid still another approach dead to the pin and sank his putt, halving the hole and clinching the match 6 up and 5 to play. This is the second match these players have engaged in, the first having been won by Smith and Nicholls at Great Neck a few weeks ago, but the season is so late that a deciding match will hardly be played. MARSTON ATLANTIC CITY GOLF VICTOR

New Jersey Champion Takes Two Easy Matches and Cup at Country Club.

Special to The New York Times.

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J., Oct. 30.—Continuing to play the same high-class golf that carried him successfully through the early stages of this tournament, Maxwell R. Marston of Baltusrol won two more matches and with them the chief cup in the open tournament on the links of the Country Club of Atlantic City today. In the final the New Jersey champion defeated Harold A. Steiner of Inwood 5 up and 4 to play.

Conditions were not so conducive to good golf as on Thursday and yesterday, a stiff wind blowing across the course making it next to impossible to keep the balls on the course. That accounts for the generally high scores. The chief winner, however, played practically as well today as he did earlier in the week.

Marston began the day auspiciously by taking James C. Parrish, Jr., of Shinnecock into camp. In the tournament here last Spring Parrish won chief honors, but he was not equal to Marston's speed today. Longer with his wood and generally steadier on the approach shots, the Jersey champion gave his opponent comparatively few openings. After being up at the turn, it was no trick at all for Marston to finish the match on the thirteenth green. The bye holes were not played, but the winner was going at about a 75 clip.

In the other semi-final Steiner proved a trifle too steady for Thomas B. Wootten, the former local caddie, who sprang a surprise yesterday by eliminating Pierre Pröal and Reginald Lewis. On this occasion Wootten had little of the deadliness of his play on the greens that marked his earlier efforts.

The final between Marston and Steiner was never in doubt from the moment the Baltusrol man drove to the first green, 315 yards, and won with a 3. On most of the greens the putting of the New Jersey champion was very accurate. He did miss comparatively short putts on the eighth and tenth greens, where his opponent won. The summary:

First Sixteen.—Semi-final Round—Harold A. Steiner, Inwood, beat Thomas B. Wootten, Atlantic City, 4 and 3; Maxwell R. Marston, Baltusrol, beat James C. Parrish, Jr., Shinnecock, 6 and 5.

Final Round—Marston beat Steiner 5 and 4.

Beaten Eight, First Sixteen.—Semi-Final Round—Hugh Willoughby, Philadelphia Country Club, beat F. H. McCall, Atlantic City, 3 and 2; R. C. Maxwell, Trenton, beat P. S. P. Randolph, Jr., Lakewood, by default.

Final Round—Willoughby beat Maxwell, 6 and 5.

Second Sixteen.—Semi-final Round—A. W. Brand, St. Andrews, beat Theodore Senseman, Atlantic City, 4 and 3; H. B. Newton, Frankford, beat F. S. Bioking, Aronimink, 2 up.

Beaten Eight, Second Sixteen.—Semi-final Round—Samuel Allison, Midland, beat F. W. Bennett, Atlantic City, 3 and 2; A. W. Westney, Atlantic City, beat E. S. Davis, Frankford, 7 and 6.

Ridgewood Country Club Golf.

Special to The New York Times.

PATERSON, N. J., Oct. 30.—Sixteen players took part in the eighteen-hole medal-play handicap for W. D. Anthony's cup at the Ridgewood (N. J.) Country Club this afternoon. W. G. Edsall was the winner, with a score of 91 gross, 18 handicap and 73 net. On Tuesday the Election Day handicaps will be played for prizes donated by the club professional, Joe Mitchell. Owing to Mitchell's success during the past season, the club Directors have re-engaged him for next year. The Winter social season of the club will be opened Monday night, when a Halloween dance will be held.

Another Peculiar Golf Play.

Here is a story of an eccentric golf play in Des Moines. Robert McKee was playing Hole 15 on the Grand View course, where the distance to the cup is a hundred yards over a pond. Since the drive was short, McKee used his mashie. A boy was paddling about in a boat on the lake to recover the balls that fell short. McKee's golf ball sailed seventy-five yards over the water, then fell into the boat, only to bounce out again and continue its flight across the pond. It stopped within about seven feet of the pin. McKee took three more to gain the cup, par for the hole.

Taylor Heads Field at Ardsley.

Members of the Ardsley Club took part in the qualifying round for the November Cup yesterday, eight becoming eligible for subsequent match play on a handicap basis. T. M. Taylor led the field with 90—16—74. Scores follow:

Qualifying Round—T. M. Taylor, 90, 16—74; B. H. Harnes, 85, 11—77; H. J. Bartholomae, 92, 14—79; C. E. Force, 89, 10—79; A. F. Robinson, 89, 10—79; T. S. Fuller, 89, 10—79; L. M. Greer, 89, 9—19; F. C. Wechmer, 100, 19—81.

Other Scores—M. S. Faton, 98, 11—82; F. L. Eldridge, 101, 18—83; T. Jackson, 103, 18—85; J. S. Spraker, 104, 18—86; G. T. Smith, 98, 10—88.

Western Golf Officials Named.

Nominations for the 1916 officials of the Western Golf Association were announced yesterday. George R. Balch of Cincinnati is named for the chief executive, with Trustin B. Boyd of Belleview, St. Louis, as Vice President. E. Hoover Bankard of Chicago will succeed George F. Henneberry as Secretary and C. C. Paddleford of Flossmoor, Chicago, is put up for Treasurer. The Directors will be as follows: H. F. Smith, Nashville; William F. Brooks, Minnikahda, Minneapolis; Ervin S. Armstrong, Los Angeles; William J. Foye, Omaha, and Arthur B. Caldwell, Detroit.

Handicap Tourney for Colgate.

Craig Colgate won the handicap against par at the Nassau Country Club yesterday. He finished 3 down. Results follow: Craig Colgate, 3 down; D. A. Loring, Jr., 5 down; H. C. Berner, 7 down; R. D. Honeyman, 8 down.

NEW BROOKFED PRESIDENT.

George S. Ward to Succeed Brother, Robert B., as Head of Club.

The Federal League announced yesterday that George S. Ward would be elected president of the Brooklyn Club to succeed the late Robert B. Ward. The two brothers were equal owners in the stock of the club.

When R. B. Ward met the Federal League owners in February, 1914, George S. Ward was in Boston. Answering a telephone call from his brother George S. returned to New York to approve the project to establish a Federal League club in Brooklyn. Glancing at the faces of James A. Gilmore, Ned Hanlon, Joe Tinker, and others whom he had known as a fan, George S. Ward remarked before a word had been spoken: "Well, I see we are going into Federal League baseball."

Details of the Brooklyn Federal team plans will be made public after the annual meeting of the league in Indianapolis on Nov. 9.

Mr. Ward was born in Allegheny City, Pa., Jan. 1, 1867.

BARNARD FIELD DAY.

E. Hausle, '17, Scores Highest Number of Points.

Barnard College held its annual Field Day on Milbank Quadrangle yesterday afternoon. The first event, the 100-yard hurdles, was won by E. Hausle, '17. The winner of the baseball throw was D. Bauer, '17, who also won first place in the discus. Second place in the discus went to R. Wachenheimer, '18. The second event was the seventy-five-yard dash. E. Hausle, '17, came in first in 10.4 seconds, with E. Haring, '16, a close second. This was followed by the high jump, won by G. Stanbrough, '19, at a height of 4 feet 3 inches. Second place was won by A. Sanborn, '18, at a height of 4 feet. G. Stanbrough won took first place in the basket ball throw.

The juniors won the 200-yard relay race, their team being E. Hausle, D. Bauer, P. Hattorf, and R. Lawrence. Not the least interesting of the events was the hockey game between the Odds and the Evens. It was a close game, the final score being 3 to 1 in favor of the Odds. H. Rau, '17, did some excellent work as half back for the Odds.

E. Hausle deserves special mention for having received the gold medal for the highest number of individual points. In spite of the wind, which persisted in blowing down the hurdles and causing much general excitement, a good number turned out and much enthusiasm was shown in all the events.

How to Make a Long Drive.

"There is no secret about the way I make long drives," says Jesse Guilford. "As far as my stance is concerned, the ball is a little nearer my left foot. I use what golfers call the palm grip. While I realize that writers on golf do not recommend it, I believe the grip is the secret of the long drives from the tee. It is not the grip I would recommend for all golfers, for, generally speaking, that grip where the club is controlled by the fingers alone is perhaps the best for most players. My friends attribute some of my wild shots to this palm grip. They may be right, but I am firmly convinced that I shall soon be able to master the long, straight drive. Instead of holding the shaft in my fingers I catch it further down in the palms of my hands, with the right hand turned well under. That gives the power to the right shoulder. My swing is a combination between the upright and the flat swing. I get a full swing, the object being to get the ball up the middle as far as I can."

Kirkby Suggests Smaller Greens.

Oswald Kirkby, former metropolitan amateur and New Jersey golf champion, has suggested changes in the laying out of golf courses, to make the approach harder and putting easier, says the Golfers' Magazine. Kirkby suggests that putting-greens be made smaller than regulation. This idea follows the suggestion by golfers that the cup be enlarged to eight inches.

"I believe greens should be made smaller and perfectly level," says Kirkby. "An approach then would be exactinz and the number of three-putt greens reduced. Eight-inch cups would never have been suggested if the putting greens had been so large. I see no value in a putting-green so large and so undulating that it is difficult to reach the hole."

Another suggestion is that two or three putting-greens be installed for one hole. With three greens, one to the left, another straight ahead, and another to the right, three varieties of approach might be had. Each green would be guarded in a different way, depending upon the contour of the ground.

After the drive the approach could be indicated and the old idea of an exacting approach getting home could be carried out better.

N. Y. A. C. Has Opening Shoot.

Judging by the attendance at the opening shoot of the Winter season at the New York Athletic Club yesterday this is going to be an exceptional year for the sport. Fifty-five gunners gathered at the Winged Foot traps and decided three interesting events. The principal shoot was at 100 targets. Prizes were offered for the best handicap and scratch gunner. The winner of the former trophy was H. B. Knight, who had a card of 77, 20—97. The high scratch gunner was Dr. Culver, who "killed" 86 out of a possible 100 blue rocks. Dr. Culver also was the winner of the Variety Cup, taking the trophy with a 16 out of 25 targets. E. H. Locatelli was the winner of the special shoot with a full score of 25 targets, shooting with a handicap of 4. There was a Halloween party at the club last night, more than 800 being present. Today there will be a shoot at Travers Island. It will be the first Sunday shoot in the history of the organization.

Oarsmen to be Minstrels.

The New York Rowing Association will give a minstrel show at the Lexington Avenue Opera House Jan. 11. The association has about twenty-eight clubs.

TO BAR OUTSIDERS FROM LOCAL TENNIS

Strong Amateur Faction Wants Only District Residents to Hold Titles.

Would it help in the development of tennis players if the so-called State and district tournaments were closed to all players save those actually residents of the State or district?

This is a question now under discussion by lovers of tennis in the smaller centres of population. Such a procedure would be a novelty in competitive amateur sports, perhaps, though in athletic circles competition for district prizes and titles is absolutely confined to athletes residing within the district.

Local players, who have neither the time nor skill to get into the limelight at a national, all-comers, invitation or similar tournaments, which bring the best players of the game together, have, however, a local pride in their club or State title—local championships that might be within their reach. Because of the attendance of the so-called "mug-hunters" local players find themselves deprived of any chance of getting, except in rare instances, any place better than semi-finalists, perhaps.

Why not have the title of Ohio State champion, for instance, mean that the holder of the title has actually won it in a "playing through" tournaments confined to residents of that State? And that as holder he must defend it the following year against the best man of that season? Under such conditions, say the advocates of this plan, the State or district title would have a meaning and a value to the holder based on State pride. As it is now a title as champion of Ohio means absolutely nothing except that the holder of the emblematic trophy won it at a tournament played somewhere in that State in which any one could compete.

State titles now are a misnomer. One player who loves the sport, but whose business will not permit him to go chasing from coast to coast in search of additions to his collection of silverware, has found from the records of 1914—and the same situation practically holds good this year—that the State championship in singles for New York is held by a Californian, that of Florida by a New Yorker, who also holds the title of champion of Maryland; the Iowa State champion is a resident of Missouri, that of the Carolinas a Texan, and the Washington State champion is a Californian. Another Texan is the champion of Arkansas. A New Yorker holds the championship of Virginia, and a Massachusetts player that of New Hampshire, the first defeating a Georgian for the title and the latter a New Yorker. The same California player is the champion of Rhode Island and Ohio, but not of his own State. A Chicago player holds the championship of Michigan, a Washington player that of Idaho. Indiana's champion is a resident of Pennsylvania, New Mexico's is a Texan, Tennessee's a Georgian, defeating a Coloradan in the final, and a Missourian holds the Oklahoma title. A Massachusetts player holds the Maine title, a resident of New Jersey that of Delaware, and one New Yorker is champion of Connecticut, as another is champion of New Jersey, while the championship in women's singles in New Jersey is held by a Connecticut woman. Doesn't it look a trifle absurd for the championship of the great lakes and Western New York to be held by a resident of California, and for all the championship titles for Northeastern Pennsylvania to be held by nonresident players, with the single exception of one of the players for women's doubles? it is asked. Does it sound quite right to say that the champion player of Long Island is a resident of Maryland? Or that a resident of Pittsburgh is champion of the New Jersey coast? Even the Bronx County title was held by a resident of Kings County.

No one particularly blames the men with the cup-hunting bee in their bonnets for accumulating all the silver-plated junk they can. The point is, does their ability to do so under existing conditions encourage amateur sport and tend to create Davis Cup players in the localities where these tournaments are held, ostensibly to develop local players? Those who would change existing conditions think not. The argument of the mug-hunters is that these open tournaments give local players a chance to pit themselves against players of the best class to their educational advantage. That may be so, according to whether you look at the proposition as mug-hunter or competing player who has local pride in being at the top of the heap in his own State or district.

Local players who do not and cannot expect to figure in the first ranking twenty, say, are talking quite seriously in favor of a movement for making all State and district tournaments closed to all except bona fide residents of those States or districts. They think the National Lawn Tennis Association should at least advise the managers of such tournaments to do this.

Carrying their position to a logical conclusion, advocates of this change would have the State champions and the runners-up, perhaps, eligible to a national championship, which would have a truly national character, with an all-comers match for the men who had not won champion honors in their State contests, possibly through the accidents which will happen in all such competitions, and are yet in the first flight of tennis players.

The principal point made by the advocates of this plan is that it would help to develop players of Davis Cup calibre by giving them confidence, a thing that can only be acquired in games played through to test the skill and playing qualities of players too modest to assert themselves in a national tournament. The preliminary contests might give them the gruelling work at the nets which they need to bring out latent skill which might not otherwise be developed.

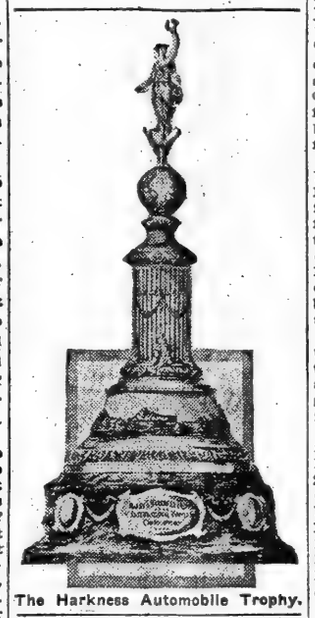
While no definite plan has yet been formed by its advocates, those who would like to see a change desire to get a nation-wide discussion of their proposition, and see what tennis players generally think of it, and whether its advantages, if any, would counterbalance the loss of gate receipts due to the absence of stars from the tournaments. They argue that it would.

WORLD'S AUTO TROPHY.

Harry S. Harkness Gives "Goddess of Victory" for Competition.

Harry S. Harkness, the automobile enthusiast, has offered another trophy to the world of sport. The latest prize will stand for the world's automobile championship. It will be to the motor car enthusiast what the America's Cup is to yachting, the Harmsworth Trophy is to motor boating, the Westchester Cup is to polo or the Davis Bowl is to tennis.

The trophy is in the form of a column of victory, which is made of fourteen karat gold, and which stands on an onyx base. On the face of the base and in the centre is a gold panel with the inscription in raised letters.



The Harkness Automobile Trophy.

Around the base the panels are connected by festoons. These panels are for yearly winners' inscriptions.

The lower member of the column represents the Sheepshead Bay speedway with racing cars going at full speed. The etching on the front of the base snows one car attempting to pass another, and around the base on the side and back are three other cars, represented as trailing after the leaders.

Above the body of the racing scene is a classic fluted column with leaf and festoon ornamentation, supporting the globe on which is a figure of the Goddess of Victory on a flying wheel. The various members of the trophy are connected by bands of laurel and oak leaf, signifying victory and strength. The total height is 88¾ inches.

The first race for the trophy will be at the Sheepshead Bay Speedway on Election Day.

NEW ONE-DESIGN CLASS.

Eight N. Y. Y. C. Members Order 40-Foot Sloops from Herreshoffs.

Eight of the new forty-foot one-design sloop yachts to be built by the Herreshoffs, at a cost of about $10,000, have been ordered by members of the New York Yacht Club, who signified their intention of starting such a class during the last cruise of the club.

This class, which bids fair to be the popular one next season, should furnish some excellent racing. The approximate dimensions of the new sloops will be forty feet water line, fifty-nine feet over all, with a beam of fourteen feet, and eight feet draft. They will be flush deck craft with a sail area close to 1,900 square feet. Those who have ordered sloops of this class are said to include George Lauder, Jr., Wilson Marshall, Edgar Palmer, Dr. James A. Bishop, and George M. Pynchon.

According to the figures furnished by James W. Alker, Secretary of the Yacht Racing Association of Long Island Sound, the winner of the championship prize among the "thirties" for 1915 is the Okee, owned by J. Albert Mahlstedt, Commodore of the New Rochelle Yacht Club. Besides winning the first and second series prizes, she is also the winner of the sweepstakes series in the class.

The Okee sailed twenty-seven races, winning ten firsts, nine seconds, and two thirds. J. W. Alker's Alerion II. won the second prize in the first and second sweepstake series and second in the Long Island Sound championship, while Ogden M. Reid's Lena won the second prize in the championship sweepstakes; Irving E. Raymond's Hope, winning third prize in the same series.

Trapshooting is now occupying the attention of many of the Long Island Sound yachtsmen. The New Rochelle and Manhasset Bay Yacht Clubs open their seasons with shoots today. The Jamaica Bay Yacht Club has added trapshooting to its list of Winter sports.

In Defense of the Bull Terrier.

The bull terrier is a misunderstood canine, says The Field, and the paper points out that it was not until 1911 that the breed had a place in the Kennel Club Stud Book. The Field says:

"The real truth about the bull terrier is that, far from being disreputable and quarrelsome, he combines all the good qualities of every other breed. As a sportsman he required no training or breaking. If he meets anything bigger than himself, an animal of which he does not like the look, he just makes up his mind to kill it, whether it be an ox or a wild beast. As for quarreling, it is absolutely beneath him, but should another dog insult him, well, only prompt human interference can save that dog's life.

"His intelligence and devotion are unsurpassed by any other breed. He can safely be trusted with the smallest baby, and will guard house and person most effectually. He rarely barks; this is most noticeable at shows, where the breed is invariably bunched in close proximity to the Airedales. On the one side a row of dazzling snow-white dogs, all silent; opposite the noise is terrific and the quarreling is constant. I may here state that I quite appreciate and greatly admire the splendid qualities of the Airedale terrier, but I cannot condemn his barking habits too strongly."

To Decide Eligibility of Swimmers.

A controversy is expected this afternoon in the annual meeting of the Intercollegiate Swimming Association at the New York Athletic Club. Arrayed on one side will be Yale and Princeton, and, opposing, Columbia, C. C. N. Y., and Pennsylvania. The issue will be the eligibility of freshmen to participate on Varsity swimming teams. Last year this same matter came up at the annual session, and the freshmen were not restricted. As a result, Columbia has the services of H. E. Vollmer, one of the largest point winners in the intercollegiate meet. The question of opening the swimming competitions to all Eastern colleges rather than the present five members of the league will also be considered. It has been contended recently that to award a swimming championship is unfair owing to the exclusive number participating. Applications for membership will probably be received this afternoon from Amherst, Union, and Rutgers. The league schedule will also be drawn up. Some of the colleges feel that the shortness of the schedule does not give them the chance to be self-supporting, and they will ask for a longer season.

YALE-COLUMBIA RACE IS FIRST IN 40 YEARS

Two Crews Raced Last in 1875—Yale Hopes to Show Superiority of System.

For the first time since their six-oar shells raced on Lake Saratoga in 1875, crews representing Yale and Columbia will row together in New Haven harbor Nov. 12. Captain Seth Low, 2d, of Yale has been anxious to race Rice's crew to prove to his uncle, Seth Low, ex-President of Columbia, that the Eli system of rowing is superior. Coach Guy Nickalls wanted the crews to race for the New York oarsmen pull the only big varsity shell in the East not defeated by the Eli's this year.

The race will be a preliminary to the Yale-Princeton football game in the Yale Bowl Nov. 13. Yale Navy will anchor its two chartered steamers near the finish so that the spectators may view the course of a mile and seven-eighths, extending from Long Wharf toward Lighthouse Point. It was planned to race on Lake Whitney or Lake Saltonstall, but both those courses are now part of the New Haven water system.

When Coach Guy Nickalls called out the Yale candidates three weeks ago the number of responding oarsmen broke all records. More than a hundred began work, and two eights have been kept in training.

The crew selected to represent Yale has four oarsmen who helped to defeat Harvard in June. Captain Seth Low, 2d, Cord Meyer, Alfred Sturtevant, and Coxswain Allen McLane were in the Yale eight. Of the others Coombe was No. 7 in the freshman eight, Atkins, No. 3, in the second varsity, Kositzky No. 4, and Gilfillan No. 2. Edward N. Harriman was a substitute for the second Varsity.

As an experiment the coaches will put Captain Low at stroke in this first race. If his work is good he will remain in that position for the Spring races. Low has rowed at No. 3 and bow in two races with Harvard. Meyer has had much experience as stroke of amateur crews in the Metropolitan district. He stroked the Yale freshmen crew a year ago and rowed No. 6 in the Yale 'Varsity last June. He will occupy the same seat in this race.

Ex-Captain Sturtevant will again row at No. 5. Jim Sheldon, who rowed No. 4 at New London, is now guard on the football eleven, and his seat will be filled by Kositzky. Gilfillan has had three seasons of rowing at Yale, one in the freshman and two in the second 'Varsity shell. Harriman, son of the late E. H. Harriman, had two years' experience at the Groton School before entering Yale, and rowed in the

CHRISTMAS FUND FOR BELGIUM GROWS

More Than $4,000 Collected in the First Week—Sympathy for Miss Cavell.

MANY GIVE FOR JEWISH AID

Red Cross Sends Supplies to France and England—Allies' Committee's Long List.

The second Dollar Christmas Fund for destitute Belgians, the first of which realized a 1914 Christmas gift of more than $50,000, passed the $4,000 mark last week, which was the first week figure of the 1915 fund. Henry Clews, the Treasurer, said yesterday that he has received scores of letters and that they indicated a great wave of sympathy for Belgium, due in a great measure to the "sufferings and death of Miss Cavell, the heroic nurse, and the increasing desire to alleviate the lot of the noncombatants in Belgium."

One subscriber to the fund, who contributed $25 to last year's fund, sent $50, saying that "this year, after reading of Miss Cavell's death, I send $50." Mr. Clews said that Sir Johnston Forbes-Robertson and Granville Barker, the English actors now touring the United States, will both give benefit performances for the fund.

The American Red Cross.

In the past week the New York Chapter of the American Red Cross shipped for the national organization supplies to France valued at $4,000, and to England another consignment, valued at about $2,000. The fund of the Red Cross in New York was increased last week by $3,100, which brought the total collections here since the outbreak of the war to $535,470.89. Subscriptions should be sent to Jacob H. Schiff, Treasurer, 130 East Twenty-second Street. The gifts of $10 or more were:

$1,000,000 GAIN IN TOTAL RESERVES

But Federal Reserve Banks Lost $1,400,000 of Their Gold Holding in the Last Week.

MORE U. S. BONDS BOUGHT

$367,000 Decline Reported in Municipal Warrants — Deposits Increase Over $3,000,000.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 30.—The weekly statement of the Federal Reserve Board, made public today at close of business on Oct. 29, shows an increase in the banks' total reserves of about $1,000,000, though the combined gold reserves show an apparent decline of $1,400,000. This amount, however, is only a small portion of the $9,400,000 of gold transferred to the Federal Reserve agents for the reduction of the bank's liabilities on outstanding Federal Reserve notes.

The total gold resources of the system, compromising amounts under control of both the banks and the Federal Reserve agents, stand now at $433,200,000, compared with $425,300,000 reported the week before, and $347,400,000 about three months previous. The gold settlement fund with the Federal Reserve Board is given as $62,000,000, as against $54,700,000 at the end of last week, and $52,100,000 three months ago. The total shown is exclusive of $24,800,000 held by the board to the credit of the Federal Reserve agents, which amount is included among the agent' gold holdings.

Bills discounted and bought in the hands of the banks show an increase of over $700,000. The largest relative increase for the week is reported for sixty-day bills, which constituted 36.2 per cent. of the total, as against 32.5 per cent. the week before. The relative amount of 10-day, 30-day, and 90-day paper—15.8 per cent., 24.0 per cent., and 19.2 per cent. respectively, were all lower than the week before. Agricultural and live stock paper maturing after ninety days, figures to the extent of $21,100,000 among the bill holdings of the banks, Chicago and Atlanta reporting over one-half of the entire amount.

Bankers' acceptances increased about $300,000, and constitute at present 30.9 per cent. of total bills held as against 30.8 per cent. last week, and 28.5 per cent. at the end of July.

An additional purchase of $25,000 of United States bonds is reported by the Kansas City Federal Reserve Bank. The amount of municipal warrants held by the banks shows a decline of about $367,000, both New York and Chicago reporting smaller holdings than for the preceding week. The ratio of earning assets to capital, 145 per cent., shows a slight improvement since last week. Member banks' deposits increased over $3,000,000 during the week, New York's larger increase being offset in part by net withdrawals shown for the Chicago, St. Louis and Atlanta banks.

An increase during the week of $8,100,000 in the amounts of Federal reserve notes outstanding is reported by the Federal reserve agents. Additional issues were made at all reserve centers except Chicago and Dallas. Of the total net amount of notes issued to all the banks, the proportion issued by the New York agent is about 32 per cent. The combined amounts issued to the three Southern banks are $47,100,000 or about 26 per cent. of the total issues. Against an aggregate of $168,400,000 of notes outstanding, the agents hold $151,800,000 of gold and $16,600,000 of commercial paper. These banks report a note circulation of $146,000,00 and a net liability thereon of $13,900,000.

Prices Firm on Paris Bourse.

PARIS, Oct. 30.—Prices were firm on the Bourse today. Three per cent. rentes, 65 francs 60 centimes for cash. Exchange on London, 27 francs 55 centimes.

LONDON MARKET QUIET.

Good Buying of Treasury Bills Decreases Money Supplies.

LONDON, Oct. 30.—Good buying of Treasury bills decreased money supplies and held discount rates firm today. American exchange was steady at the recent rally, but near the close buyers caused the rate to ease off to 4.64½.

The stock market was quiet but firm. There were several good features, notably Canadian Pacific, Americans, coppers, Brazilians, and International Mercantile Marine, all at higher prices, but stocks were scarce, and the actual business was only moderate in volume. American securities closed firm. Interest in the war loan rights ceased, as this was the last day for the conversion of consols and the old war loan into the new issue.

FINANCIAL MARKETS

Record Saturday Activity Carries Stocks to New High Levels—Rail Gains.

All signs have failed in this market, so that it was not surprising, perhaps, that yesterday's two-hour session, following a very spirited upturn on Friday and preceding the beginning of a broken week, should carry the upward movement still further. Experienced brokers expected to see a strong opening yesterday, followed by a reaction as holders of stocks took their profits to be on the safe side over Election Day, but a considerable volume of liquidation that actually occurred proved unavailing against the great mass of buying orders that poured in upon the market. Total dealings yesterday were more than 700,000 shares, making it the largest two-hour session since the reopening of the Stock Exchange. The way in which dealings in stocks are widening out as the speculative fever takes hold in fresh territory is amazing, and lends color to the prediction that before the holidays two-million share days are likely to be seen.

Almost the entire list of stocks displayed underlying strength yesterday, but the railroads stood out above the industrials in this respect. It really looks now as though the long expected shift of interest from the war stocks to the railroads had become a fact. In Saturday's market a number of standard rails sold higher than they have in more than a year. Southern Pacific touched 102, Union Pacific 139½, and Northern Pacific 150¾, all new high figures. Chesapeake and Ohio was very active and closed at the top, 62¾, with a net gain of three points. Erie was the most active of the rails, but the very excellent earnings statement made public yesterday failed to help the price, and the stock closed a little off for the day. It is probable that the recent advance was made with full knowledge of the showing to be made in the September statement. The Erie's September gross was $6,253,866, a gain of $747,000. The net for the month was $2,421,000, a gain of $968,000, or 66 per cent. over the earnings for the corresponding month of last year. For the nine months ending with September net earnings increased almost $3,000,000. Another excellent report was that of the Chesapeake and Ohio, whose September's gross increased $530,000, and its net $348,000. A year ago the net earnings for this month were but $392,000; this year $740,000. For the nine months the company earned $1,942,000, as against $940,000 a year ago. Reports such as these have led investors to expect several months of exceedingly good earnings and the rise in railroad shares has been based on such expectations.

The bank statement showed an increase of $24,064,000 in loans, and an increase of $8,267,000 in the aggregate reserves as of the close of business Friday. This increase in loans, which was explained in part by foreign liquidation, syndicate operations, and the foreign borrowing, did not affect the strength of the banks' position, for they showed an increase of $3,415,000 in the surplus reserve.

TOPICS IN WALL STREET.

Signs of a Healthy Market.

Brokers commented yesterday on the "healthy" condition of the market at the close of the week. By this they meant that for several days a saner sort of speculation had been in progress than before, with the war stocks thrust into the background. Further than this, it was pointed out that the industrial list, with the exception of United States Steel and the copper shares, had been superseded by the railroad stocks in point of interest for traders. The industrials did not turn weak because of neglect, because they were not actually neglected, but there was so much greater activity in the railroad issues than in preceding weeks of the bull movement that the market took on a stable aspect. The railroads have three times before since June 1 swung into prominence, only to be overtaken and surpassed by the special industrials every time. Wall Street seemed to be convinced yesterday that the latest awakening would be in evidence for some time.

No More Curb Trading in Cotton.

With business active and profits good, the prescribed business day in the markets has been too short for many participants. On the Curb, trading has been in progress daily until dark for many weeks. Some of the Cotton Exchange members sought to stretch their working hours last week, with the result that notice was served on them by the authorities yesterday that curb trading would have to stop. The statement issued from the Secretary's office said with some emphasis that the rule would be enforced, as outside trading is not countenanced in the Exchange's by-laws.

Schwab Escapes Additional Worry.

Charles M. Schwab was asked a few days ago whether he would be greatly disturbed if some one else secured control of the Pennsylvania Steel Company. He replied that he had enough to worry about with the Bethlehem without looking for any other troubles. The exercise by W. H. Donner of his option on half of the Pennsylvania Steel stock held by the Pennsylvania Railroad seems to remove from Mr. Schwab's shoulders any worries that might have come from a purchase of the shares by the Bethlehem interests. While figures were lacking in the financial district yesterday, the impression gained in quarters close to the Pennsylvania Railroad was that an excellent sale had been made. It has been known for some weeks that Mr. Schwab had his own ideas about the value of the Pennsylvania Steel properties to the Bethlehem, which he was not willing to change. He has said that the application of considerable capital to the Pennsylvania Company would put it in a strong position in the industry, but has not appeared eager to have charge of this financing.

Standard Oil in China.

The Standard Oil organization has never been known to rush headlong into a new undertaking without knowing about what lay ahead. So it may be taken for granted that the venture into Chinese oil fields will be thoroughly sized up by the Standard of New York before final details of the agreement with the Chinese Government are announced. A rumor on Friday that a hitch had occurred with respect to negotiations over oil development in China was denied yesterday in quarters of authority. It was learned that the agreement would not be closed until the engineers had made a thorough examination of the oil producing territory.

Bethlehem's Single Sale.

Bethlehem Steel shares closed yesterday nearly 75 points under the highest quotation of 600 recorded week before last. Only 100 shares sold in yesterday's session, and this lot went at 524¾, a decline from Friday's last quotation of 15¼ points. It may be that the transfer of trading affection from war stocks to the railroads affected Bethlehem adversely, or the price may have risen to a point so high as to repel speculation. At any rate the issue lost ground last week in a decidedly jerky fashion. Even with a recession equal to three-quarters of its par value, the stock appeared rather strong in contrast with its quotation a year ago. In the New Street market last Oct. 30 it was quoted at 27 bid, 28½ asked.

VARIED PHASES OF THE COUNTRY'S BUSINESS LIFE

THE MERCHANT'S POINT OF VIEW

Retail trade, under the stimulus of seasonable weather, shows a breadth of movement that embraces all branches of things to wear and practically every section of the country. Merchants from widely scattered points who have recently visited this city have been practically unanimous in their statements to this effect, and the volume and variety of their purchases have emphasized and given point to what they said. A very notable feature, also, of the retail buying movement has been the marked increase in the purchase of better, or higher quality, goods. This is said to reflect the general improvement in conditions, as well as the greater willingness of the public to relax from the rigid economy that was much in evidence some time ago. The expanding business of the larger industrial enterprises, including those of production and transportation, has been of great service in awakening a confidence essential to increased and profitable merchandising.

The Drop in Cotton Prices.

Quite puzzling has been the course of the cotton market during the last week. The report of the ginners was decidedly bullish, but its publication produced no effect so far as advancing of prices was concerned. The effect was rather the reverse. Stories circulated of a belief that the crop would prove finally a million bales or so larger than the estimates and that the carryover from last year would be a heavy burden. A temporary drop in the exports led to predictions that there would be a large falling off in the foreign demand. Doubts were also expressed as to a continuance of the consumption of the staple by the domestic mills. Probably back of all this was the belief that the prices had been put up by speculation and that the large amount of cotton withdrawn from the market by growers and others down South constituted a menace to the fixity of prices at a high level. There was some reflection of the forebodings in the cotton goods market, where the transactions, especially in printcloths and the like, were on a subdued scale. In fancies, however, business continued to be good. Colored goods are high in price because of the dyestuffs troubles, and there is no disposition to force sales. Orders are taken subject to ability to deliver. The market for all kinds of knit goods remains active, with prices well maintained or increasing. Foreign orders constitute a feature as to these goods that is constantly becoming more noticeable.

Wool and Woolens.

Nothing has occurred to change the position of wool excepting, possibly, to enhance the value of the desirable sorts. This has been shown during the last week at the auctions in London, and the same conditions prevail at the antipodes, in South America, and in this country. At the foreign sales American bidders have helped to put up prices, and they have had competition from Russian and other buyers. In Australia the Italians and the Japanese have been among the eager purchasers. The sales in New Zealand, beginning a fortnight hence, will have a number of Americans in attendance who are seeking crossbreds. In woolen goods the market is in the hands of the sellers, and buyers are beginning to realize this. In some instances persons who ordered cancellations, which were cheerfully received, have been obliged to buy back the same goods at an advance. Complaints are already heard of dissatisfaction with the quality of dyes put into cloths, and also of the lack of certain desired hues, but the buyer has to make the best of it. The mills are busy on foreign orders, which are by no means all for military purposes. A fairly good export business has been developed for civilian use, not only for European countries, but for South America and elsewhere. There are a number of military orders still unplaced, among them being some for blankets and horse blankets, the last named being for the Italian cavalry.

Those Detained Goods.

When a number of importers recently came together and made known their troubles because the British blockade prevented their getting goods from Germany and Austria, they rather magnified the amount of trade at stake, as it now appears. This was evident, however, at the time to all familiar with the normal volume of imports from the two countries named. The spokesmen for the importers claimed, for instance, that as much as $167,000,000 worth of goods were awaiting shipment at Rotterdam and that all these had either been ordered and paid for prior to March 1 or that liability existed for the payment of them. How absurd this claim was is apparent from the fact that the normal exports from Germany and Austria to this country only average about $200,000,000 a year and that this figure includes dyestuffs which Germans decline or are unable to send. Besides this, about $100,000,000 worth of goods had already come from the two countries from the beginning of the war. Again, there were all told only about 700 applications put in for permits to obtain detained goods, and, even if all were bona fide, this would make it appear that each claim represented about $240,000, which is ridiculous. Most of the claims were for small amounts and, in less than 200 cases, had proofs been presented to show that they came within the Britis stipulation. But these facts should not divert attention from the real grievance which exists. This is the absolutely unwarranted interference with neutral trade in non-contraband goods which has been taken up by this Government in the official remonstrance now on its way. While on this matter it may be worth calling attention to the reported order of the German Government forbidding all exports. This may be justified by the fact that Germany has little, if anything, to export, it having hardly enough of textiles and metals for its own needs, or even of dyestuffs. About the only things it could really spare are clay products and toys. Germany has been wont to get raw materials from the outside and to export manufactured products. It now lacks the raw materials which its own people require, and the export trade must languish until supplies are received.

Surprises in Foreign Trade.

During the week the Department of Commerce gave out the details, by geographical divisions, of the foreign trade for the eight months ended with August. They show some rather remarkable results. Taking August alone, it appears that, while the drop in imports for the month from Europe, as compared with August, 1914, was about $12,500,000, the total of imports was about $12,000,000 more. This was made up by increases of $7,000,000 from North American countries, a similar amount from those of South America, and $11,000,000 from Asiatic nations. For the eight months' period the principal interest in the imports centres in those of the belligerent nations. Those of Austria-Hungary showed a drop from $12,802,157 last year to $4,540,168 this; those from Germany from $119,887,898 to $36,819,943; those from Belgium from $28,184,693 to $1,771,434; those from the United Kingdom from $194,708,846 to $161,737,848, and those from France from $77,309,772 to $46,994,257.

It is in the exports, however, that the chief surprises come. They show increases to all quarters of the globe, Europe taking about $850,000,000 more of American products, North America about $3,500,000 more, South America $21,000,000 more, Asia over $28,000,000 more, Oceania $12,000,000 more, and Africa $5,000,000 more. The exports to Germany and Austria-Hungary for the period were $157,105,580 less than for the corresponding period in 1914. As against this must be put the vast increase in exports to the neutral nations, Norway, Sweden, and the Netherlands, as, well as to Italy before that country joined the Allies. This increase footed up $225,742,648 above the total for the period last year, making a net result of over $68,000,000 in excess of the trade lost to the Germanic powers. There is more than a suspicion that a lot of this excess went indirectly to Germany.

Australia's Tariff Commission.

To those who believe that most economic difficulties may be overcome by the agency of a Tariff Commission may be commended the reading of a report by such a body in Australia. The industries of that country have been "protected" by a tariff which was justified not only because of the revenue thereby obtained but by the added circumstance that there was no chance of an export business being obtained in manufactured products. Over two years ago many applications were made to the Government for what was virtually the absolute prohibition of imports of all goods likely to compete with the domestic ones. The matter was sent to the Interstate Commission of Australia on Sept. 8, 1913, for investigation and report. The investigation was a most thorough one, and included visits by the commission to 120 industrial establishments. The results are embodied in a series of reports which have just been made. It was found, among other things, that, while many industrial establishments are managed with a view to efficiency and the comfort of the employes, insufficient attention is given to cost accounting and the methods of foreign competitors. It was also found that in many cases the tariff failed to "stimulate progressive methods and economical management." Some of the other conclusions are:

Prohibitive duties encourage other monopolies and other combinations which destroy competition and unduly increase the cost of living, to the advantage of the factory proprietors but to the detriment of the workers and the community generally.

There is already in Australia, as we have seen during the present investigation, a growth of monopoly in various branches of industry, which, if not subject to supervision and control, will be attended with mischief to the general welfare.

It is worthy of attention whether some means may not be devised by which, when the security conferred by the policy of protection is improperly used to create restrictions on internal competition and acquire excessive profits for manufacturers, there may be a check which will insure a prompt and effective remedy.

Somehow or other, this reads as though it described conditions in the United States.

More as to Dyestuffs.

A chance remark by Mr. Pratt of the Department of Commerce as to a possible boycott by the makers or importers of German dyes has led to some discussion. This was not unknown in the past, when the German companies were engaged in the business of stifling competition in this country. They did not, however, suppress all the dyemaking factories, a few of which, having German owners, kept on with the manufacture of certain colors, using intermediates made in Germany. These domestic factories have announced enlargements since the war began, and have declared their output to be four times what it was before. If this has really happened, there ought to be quite a large production now, since in ante-bellum times about 20 per cent. of all the dyes used in this country were made here. As a matter of fact, judging from the statements of the textile men and others interested, the added supplies of colors have been so small as to be almost negligible. Meanwhile, also, some of the American-made colors seem to have reached the hands of speculators who are exacting additional profits, although the makers in some instances tried to justify their own high charges by declaring that they wished the added profits to pay for the new construction needed for enlarged production. If the American dyemakers wished to play into the hands of the Germans and preserve for the latter their control of this field, they could hardly adopt a better course.

COMPLAINTS BY OR AGAINST SALESMEN

How Lawsuits are Avoided and Rights Maintained Through a Committee.

To the average person a lawsuit is a thing to be dreaded and to be avoided whenever possible. To the average salesman such an action is a thing especially to keep away from, not only because of the expense and trouble attached, but for the possible effect on his chances of obtaining future employment, particularly so when the suit arises from a dispute over a contract or some other business matter.

It was with a view to doing away with the need of actions of this sort, so far as the salesmen who make up its membership are concerned, that the executives of the Garment Salesmen's Association of this city brought the Grievance and Complaint Committee into being. Ever since its inception the work of the committee has been to keep the various business troubles of the members out of the courts, and, from all accounts, it has succeeded admirably.

According to a man who is very well posted on the workings of the committee, one of the best things about it is the fairness with which it works. It often happens that, in adjudicating a dispute between an employer and a salesman who is a member of the organization, the latter is found to be in the wrong. In such cases there is, no taint of unfairness to the employer in the workings of the committee, and the decision is made solely on what the evidence shows. On the other hand, the salesman, in fighting his battle before the committee, is sure of a sympathetic understanding and a chance to plead his cause to the utmost, and, if he is in the right, there is no shading of justice in favor of the opposing side.

When a complaint or dispute comes to the attention of the committee it is taken up in the following way: The full committee meets and the case is laid before it—for the salesman by the counsel for the association; for the manufacturer, if the case be against an employer, by legal talent employed by the manufacturer or by the trade organization of which he is a member. Two members of the manufacturer's organization take part in the hearing as "judges," while two members of the committee act in a similar capacity for the salesmen's organization. The matter is then threshed out before the committee and the two representatives of the opposing side by the counsel in the case.

In effect this threshing out is the same as a suit fought out in the courts, excepting that the contending forces are given, perhaps, a fuller chance of stating their cases than might be accorded them in a regular court. Legal phraseology and technicalities are avoided wherever possible. After both sides have presented their arguments the decision is rendered by the four "judges," two of whom, it must be remembered, are not members of the salesmen's association.

A variety of "cases" have come up for trial before the committee. One of them, for instance, concerned a salesman who claimed that, under certain provisions of a written contract, he was entitled to about $300 in commissions for the sale of a special line of merchandise in a specified territory. His employers refused to pay it, but, rather than take the case into court, they placed it before the committee for trial. The result was that the salesman was declared in the wrong, and the extent of his award at the hands of the "judges" was about 1 per cent. of the claim.

In another case a certain firm had a man under written contract, from which they wished to be released. The salesman was willing, having another position in view; but under the contract he claimed that he had $1,500 coming to him. This case was also decided against the salesman, but he was awarded $500. Inasmuch as he immediately took the other position, the $500 was practically "found money." Many other cases along these lines have come up, all being settled solely on the evidence produced. The decisions, it is said, are about equally divided for and against the salesmen. Very often cases come up in which there are no written contracts, but merely oral agreements. In such cases it is a matter of determining what the truth is and who is telling it.

Not all of the disputes brought up concern the salesman and the employer, many of them being troubles with railroads, hotels, and transportation companies. In these cases the matter is fought out for the committee and the complaining salesman by the association's counsel. An instance of this part of the committee's work concerned a salesman who reached Pittsburgh early in the day and who did not get his sample trunks from the railroad until 11 P. M. This naturally made him lose the day, as far as business was concerned, and he entered a claim for $40 through the committee. The railroad valued his time at $5, but through the work of the association's lawyer a better settlement was obtained.

In several instances the committee has taken up such minor claims as concern overcoats lost in Pullman cars, where it is usually a matter of proving negligence on the part of the porter in order to obtain settlement. Other articles that are lost in one way or another are frequently settled for through the committee and its lawyer. Claims against railroads and transportation companies for damage to trunks, &c., are also fought out through the committee, and the money collected for the salesmen when the damage is made good.

Not all of the complaints received come from the salesmen. It sometimes happens that a hotel proprietor or manager will write in and say that a salesman has borrowed money from the hotel and that he shows no signs of returning it. Nine times out of ten the salesman is not a member of the garment salesmen's organization, in which event the committee can do nothing. If by some chance a member is guilty the committee will try to make him see the error of his way. If he persists in doing this sort of thing he will be recommended for expulsion from the association. So far, however, no members have been lost in this way.

RUG AND CARPET SALES.

Great Demand Shown Both at the Auction and Otherwise.

The biggest week in the history of the rug and carpet trade of this country closed yesterday after a six-day period of unprecedented activity in actual buying and placing of orders for future delivery. The week was not only characterized by the largest individual auction ever held—that of the Alexander Smith & Sons Carpet Company—but by the Spring openings of the principal factors in the industry. These features, taken in connection with an outpouring of buyers the like of which had never before been witnessed here, combined to make the week a notable one.

When the last offering at the Smith sale went under the hammer yesterday afternoon representatives of the company estimated the total receipts for the week's auction at close to $3,400,000. In this period 97,000 bales of rugs and 8,000 rolls of carpets of all kinds had been disposed of to buyers representing every section of the United States and Canada.

Further than this, the auction, as well as the orders placed elsewhere for Spring lines, made it evident that stocks throughout the country needed replenishing badly. The heavy buying also was regarded as an indication of the general improvement in business throughout the country. Direct testimony on this point was, in fact, given by many of the visitors, representing every section.

Stephen Sanford & Sons, Incorporated, who issued a special competitive price list on all of their lines for the week, reported yesterday that 30,000 bales of rugs had been disposed of, besides a good-sized business in carpets. A representative of the firm said the week's offerings and the comparatively low prices at which many lines of goods had been purchased showed the value of buyers coming to this market rather than staying at home and paying higher prices later for identical lines. Notwithstanding the satisfactory character of the business done by the Sanford concern last week, the company's salesmen are about to start out on the road anticipate an excellent season.

Another revision of Spring prices upward was announced yesterday by Sanford & Sons, to become effective tomorrow, while Alexander Smith & Sons also will mark prices up, effective next Wednesday. Both concerns issued price lists for Spring goods last Monday showing advances over the Fall rates. At both offices it was stated that further upward revisions may be made at any time. The Smith firm was said to be pretty well sold up for Spring business.

GOOD CHANCE FOR AMERICAN RIBBONS

They Promise to Outsell Foreign Ones Here and May Hold Their Own Abroad.

It has been no unusual thing to see a sign in a shop window announcing the fact that Spanish is spoken within, but this outward manifestation of a desire to do business with Spanish-speaking people has been restricted almost without exception to the retail trade. In the window of a prominent manufacturer of silks and ribbons, however, there now appears a neat brass sign giving the name and address and the product of the house in Spanish. And, behind that sign, is a story of how the domestic ribbon manufacturer hopes not only to secure South American business while his foreign competitors are hampered by war conditions, but to hold and increase it when the war is over. How high the energetic American ribbon manufacturer has aspired may be understood from the well planned project of a domestic house to put a line of goods in the Galleries Lafayette, the French department store, an experiment that unfortunately was prevented by the outbreak of war.

In tackling any problem outside the immediate province of his activities, that is, the home trade, the American manufacturer has been unduly cautious at times. In the ribbon business there are men now who hold that it is useless to attempt to build up a trade in South America, as the only prospect is that, when the war ends and foreign houses once more have a fair field, they will regain all they have lost. But another view of the situation is taken and backed up with strong facts and figures.

A domestic house went after South American business when the war evident that foreign supplies would fall short of supplying the demand in the Latin-American countries. Very little money was spent in pioneer work, and their experience has been that even the longest chances taken in shipping sample lines to salesmen in the territory they coveted have materialized in profitable orders. Certain conditions of shipment had to be complied with, but once understood they were easy to put into effect. Details going to show how this branch of the business was built up are not so significant as is the actual change of opinion regarding the respective merits of American and foreign ribbons that has occurred in this country. This evolution is more significant because what the ribbon manufacturers hope to do is to create a similar feeling in the markets they are seeking.

"American women," said one ribbon man, "have found that ribbons made in this country are better suited to their purposes than those that are imported. In the first place, taking two ribbons, one foreign made the other of domestic manufacture at the same price, it can be readily shown that the domestic fabric has more 'hand' to it. Putting finish or body into a ribbon is something foreign manufacturers have yet to learn. You can't buy a ribbon from abroad for 1 cent a ligne more than a domestic ribbon that will give the same satisfaction from the standpoint of appearance. The foreign ribbon may wear longer, but it won't have the appearance that women require. We use more weighting, but this is not an undesirable thing because it helps give us the sort of fabric we want.

"In the old days a woman purchased a black taffeta dress that would last for years. There are garments stored away today originally made of such stanch material that they are as good as new at the present time. But women do not want long-wearing fabrics, nor for that matter, do they every would only be frank enough to admit it. I offer in evidence the smile of satisfaction that lights up the woman's face when she has taken out her last year's frock and finds that "it is impossible." The style changes have made it necessary to get something new every season, and, to give most satisfaction, the garment or fabric should be of attractive appearance and wear well for the required period.

"It is not necessary, then, to produce a ribbon that will wear forever in order to satisfy the present-day demand, but it is necessary to turn out the most attractive ribbon possible. It must stand up when tied into a bow, and not droop in the way even a good grade of foreign ribbon will. In short, the ribbon demanded is one that has 'hand,' body, and finish.

"One house was accustomed to do a business of $1,000,000 a year in foreign ribbons, but this trade has dropped to a very nominal sum. There is more money in selling foreign ribbons, and it would be natural under the circumstances for a house to push their sale. In spite of this fact, however, the domestic grades have been making more and more progress every season, until it looks as if foreign business in this market would dwindle down to a few novelties.

"What the American woman has learned of the superiority of the ribbons manufactured in this country we are going to teach the South Americans, and we are going to tackle European markets just as soon as conditions permit.

"I don't predict that the sale of foreign ribbons will cease in this market, as the fact cannot be denied that the French designs, taken as a whole, are superior to those turned out here. My idea is that, outside of a small amount of novelties, I cannot see very much ahead for the foreign manufacturers.

"There are trade opportunities for the domestic houses, at present, that it would be very foolish for them to disregard because of the prospect of foreign competition when the war has ended."

AT FALL RIVER MILLS.

Lighter Business Due to Lack of Interest All Around.

FALL RIVER, Oct. 30.—This week has been a slow one in the cotton goods markets due to a very great extent to the lack of interest taken in market conditions by both manufacturer and buyer. During the early days of the week the market showed some weak places and it is reported that some styles could be purchased for a trifle less than was quoted in the open market. All mills would not reduce prices, but there were some that were willing to concede something.

During the closing days of the week cotton took a sharp advance and prices became firmer, so that now market quotations may be considered as being stiff. Reports were heard during the week to the effect that New York factors were selling goods among second hands and this had the effect of reducing the amount of business which would have been done in New England markets. Some time ago New York buyers bought in a good supply of goods at much lower prices than are prevailing now, and some saw an opportunity to make some profits on the basis of current prices and sold their goods. The amount of goods sold at reduced prices is so small as not to affect the volume for the week. The demand for general lines of goods was light and only a few styles received the attention of buyers. There was little call for narrow goods and only a moderate demand for the wider styles. Mills manufacturing sateens, drills and specialties have done a fair amount of business. The fine goods concerns are doing a comfortable business and profits are said to be very snug. The week closed with the demand for practically all styles rather light, and with prices fairly well maintained.

The total sales for the week are estimated at about 100,000 pieces of which about 25,000 to 45,000 pieces were spots. Contracts extend through the balance of the year with a few running into the new year.

The Gray Goods Situation.

While the business put through yesterday on staple fabrics in the local gray goods market was not great, there was a good inquiry told of for merchandise of this character for delivery in the first three months of next year at current prices. For the present, at least, the mills do not appear disposed to take these bids seriously. The call for fancy goods and specialties keeps up, especially for poplins, which are wanted badly for both near-by and future delivery. Spot prices on staple printcloths follow:

39-inch, 80-80s	6¼c	38½-inch, 64-56s	4½c
39-inch, 72-76s	5¾c	38½-inch, 60-52s	4¼c

Crossbred Wools Sell Well.

LONDON, Oct. 30.—The offerings at the wool auction sales today consisted of a miscellaneous selection of 7,200 bales. The demand was good and prices were firm, the best grades of crossbreds often selling at 1¼ per cent. advance. Americans continued to buy greasy and sliped clips and Russia bought good scoured merinos, but home traders were the heaviest buyers. There will be no sales Monday, Nov. 1.

COMMODITIES PRICES.

There were two features to Dun's list of wholesale commodities prices last week, as compared with that of the week before. One was that the total number of changes was smaller, and the second was that the general upward tendency was not so strong. In all, there were eighty-two changes, against ninety-nine in the previous week, and fifty-two were upward.

The following list gives the minimum wholesale prices quoted last week on forty-three standard commodities in this city, unless otherwise specified. They are corrected to Oct. 29, and with them are given comparative prices for the previous week and the corresponding week last year:

* New Crop.

The dominant feature of the list last week was the strength that was shown in the markets for iron and steel. There were seventeen changes in the part of the list devoted to these markets, and not a one of them was downward. The demand from both foreign and domestic buyers was reported stronger than ever before, and the bulk of the changes was on finished and semi-finished materials. They included advances on billets, wire rods, beams, angles, &c. The tone of the minor metals was firm to higher, advances being shown on pig aluminium, in ton lots, Asiatic antimony, spelter, lead, and tin. Copper was steady on the basis of the recent decline.

There was quite a reversal in the foodstuffs part of the list for, despite the general strength, there were a few more declines than advances. Flour prices were easier, all grades showing declines that ranged from 10 to 30 cents a barrel. New spring wheat flour was the weakest of the listed grades, all of the declines being due more or less to the drop in wheat. There was weakness in the major provisions at Chicago also, the only advance of the week being shown on short ribs. Mess pork continued steady, but lower prices were quoted on live beef, hogs, and sheep, as well as on prime lard. Bacon was cheaper in this city.

A steady demand and limited receipts caused a firmer tone to dairy products, the best grade of butter and all of the listed sorts of cheese and eggs being higher. Neither fresh fruits nor vegetables showed marked change through the week, but there was a somewhat weaker tone to dried fruits. No. 7 Rio coffee advanced, but the only change in tea was a decline in low Hyson. All of the changes in the spice market, which were few, were upward, but the raw sugars lost the ground gained in the previous week.

There was again considerable unsteadiness to drugs, chemicals, dyestuffs, and oils, fifteen of the twenty-two changes in this part of the general list being downward. The most interesting advances were on opium, which moved up to $10.05 a pound in jobbing lots, or $1 a pound higher than at this time last year, and on C. P. glycerine, in bulk, which has advanced about 150 per cent. in the last year. The interesting declines were on 52 per cent. caustic soda and blue vitriol.

In the grain market the advances were supplied by oats and malting barley, while wheat, corn, malt, and rye went down. In the hide markets there was not much change, the only decline being offset by two advances. Spot and near-by burlap prices weakened during the week, both on light and heavy goods. Spot jute also declined, but hemp advanced. The remaining changes for the week were advances on spirits of turpentine and on raw silk.

WHEAT.

The wheat market on Saturday developed an easier tone and prices declined ⅝c to 1c. In the local cash market No. 1 Northern Duluth was quoted at 1.05⅝, and No. 1 Northern Manitoba, 1.05¼, cost, insurance, and freight, Buffalo. No. 1 durum, 1.13⅛, free on board, New York.

CORN.

The corn market moved within a very narrow range, but the undertone was easy owing to continued favorable weather and prospects for larger receipts, closing at ⅜c to ⅝c net decline. Receipts at primary points showed an increase for the week of about 800,000 bushels. In the local cash market No. 2 yellow corn was quoted at 75¼c, prompt shipment.

PROVISIONS.

The market for hog products was firm early in the day, owing to a show of strength in the hog position, but on the advance selling pressure increased and values lost the early gain and closed at only slightly above the lowest. Receipts of hogs at interior points were 31,000. Chicago received 7,000, estimated for Monday, 27,000, and for next week, 110,000; Kansas City received 1,500, and Omaha 2,000.

EGGS.—Receipts yesterday, 4,507 cases. The market closed rather quiet. High grades of fresh gathered eggs are scarce and held firmly. Good medium qualities steady, with a fair demand. More seriously mixed and irregular lots drag at irregular prices. The range of values is unchanged. Storage eggs show somewhat irregular tone; sales reported are generally at unchanged prices, and most holders show some confidence in the situation although there is a freer offering on the part of Western buyers. Up to effect important sales the market lacks firmness. Near-by eggs scarce, and fancy new-laid stock brings extreme prices. Mixed qualities and all of inferior lots range widely in value. Fresh gathered, extra fine, per dozen, 37@38c; extra firsts, 35@36c; firsts, 30@34c; seconds, 27@29c; thirds and poorer, 23@26c; dirties, No. 1, 22½@22c; No. 2 and poorer, 19@22c; checks, good to choice, dry, 21@21½c; culls and inferior, 16@20½c; refrigerator, special marks, fancy, 26c; firsts, 24½@25½c; seconds, 23@24c; thirds or poorer, 20@22¼c; dirties, 18@21c; State, Pennsylvania, and nearby hennery whites, fine to fancy, 53@60c; ordinary to good, 48@53c; gathered whites, ordinary to fine, 35@50c; Western gathered whites, 36@45c; State, Pennsylvania, and near-by hennery browns, 40@42c; gathered brown and mixed colors, 30@38c; near-by refrigerator whites, 27@30c.

THE CASE OF EDITH CAVELL

A Reply to Dr. Albert Zimmermann, Germany's Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs

By James M. Beck

Former Assistant Attorney General of the United States, and Author of "In the Supreme Court of Civilization: The Dual Alliance vs. the Triple Entente."

Mr. Beck, who is one of the leaders of the New York Bar, is the author of the most widely read article written since the war began, entitled: "The Dual Alliance vs. The Triple Entente," which was subsequently expanded into a book, called "The Evidence in the Case," pronounced by a distinguished publicist to be "the classic of the war." After its publication in THE NEW YORK TIMES this article was reprinted in nearly every language of the civilized nations and over a million copies of it were published.

THOSE who have regarded the Supreme Court of Civilization—meaning thereby the moral sentiment of the world—as a mere rhetorical phrase or an idle illusion should take note how swiftly that court—sitting now as one of criminal assize—has pronounced sentence upon the murderers of Edith Cavell. The swift vengeance of the world's opinion has called to the bar General Baron von Bissing, and in executing him with the lightning of universal execration has forever degraded him.

Baron von der Lancken may possibly escape general obloquy, for his part in the crime was no greater than that of Pilate, who sought to wash his hands of innocent blood; but von Bissing will enjoy "until the last syllable of recorded time" the unenviable fame of Judge Jeffreys. He, too, was an able Judge and probably believed that he was executing justice, but because he did not execute it in mercy, but with a ferocity that has made his name a synonym for judicial tyranny, the world has condemned him to lasting infamy, and this notwithstanding the fact that he was made Chief Justice of the King's Bench, Lord High Chancellor of England, and a peer of the realm. All these titles are forgotten. Only that of "Bloody Jeffreys" remains.

Similarly, if his master shall be pleased to honor General Baron von Bissing with the iron cross for his action in the case of Miss Cavell, as the Kaiser honored the Captain of the submarine which destroyed the Lusitania—and what order could be more appropriate in both cases than the cross, which recalls how another innocent victim to judicial tyranny was sacrificed?—then even the Order of the Iron Cross will not save von Bissing from lasting obloquy. I do not question that he acted according to his lights and shared with Dr. Albert Zimmermann great "surprise" that the world should make such a sensation about the murder of one woman. Trajan once said that the possession of absolute power had a tendency to transform even the most humane man into a wild beast, and Judge Black in his great argument in the case of ex parte Milligan recalled the fact that Robespierre in his early life resigned his commission as Judge rather than pronounce the sentence of death, and that Caligula passed as a very amiable young man before he assumed the imperial purple. The story is as old as humanity that the appetite for blood "grows by what it feeds upon."

MISS EDITH CAVELL.
From a Photograph Taken Only a Short Time Before Her Execution, Just Received Here.

The murder of Miss Cavell was one of exceptional brutality and stupidity. It never occurred to her judges that her murder would add an army corps to the forces of the Allies and that every English soldier will fight more bravely because of her shining example. So little was this appreciated either in Brussels or Berlin that the German Foreign Office, in its official apology for the crime, issued over the signature of Herr Doctor Albert Zimmermann, Under Secretary of Foreign Affairs, expresses its surprise > that the shooting of an Englishwoman and the condemnation of several women in Brussels for treason have caused a sensation.

What extraordinary moral naïveté! How could they appreciate that after the firing squad had done its work and the body of the woman had been given hasty burial the victim's virtues would

> "plead like angels, trumpet-tongued, against
> The deep damnation of her taking off;
> And pity, like a naked new-born babe,
> Striding the blast, or Heaven's cherubim, horsed
> Upon the sightless couriers of the air,
> Shall blow the horrid deed in every eye,
> That tears shall drown the wind."

This happened with incredible rapidity, and the Kaiser made haste to respite the eight other intended victims—two of them being also women—and the Berlin Foreign Office also issued to the world its defense of its action.

It began with an expression of "pity that Miss Cavell had to be executed," but the sincerity of this pity can be measured by the fact that concurrently with Dr. Zimmermann's official apology there came from Berlin an "inspired" supplemental explanation, which sought to depreciate the character and services of the dead nurse by stating "that she earned a living by nursing, charging fees within the means of the wealthy only."

The world has an abundant refutation of this cruel and cowardly slur upon the memory of a dead woman, for one who first hazarded her life and then gave it freely to save the lives of others—for such was the charge for which she died—is not a woman to restrict her gracious ministrations of mercy for mercenary motives.

The Kaiser has been swift to see the deadly injury to his cause of this latest evidence of military tyranny. Not only has he respited Miss Cavell's alleged accomplices—as if to say with Macbeth, "thou canst not say I did it"—but it is said that he has summoned von Bissing and von der Lancken to explain their actions in the matter, but as the Kaiser is responsible for the invasion of Belgium and has hitherto permitted its attendant horrors, he can no more absolve himself from some share of responsibility than could Macbeth disavow his responsibility for the deeds of his two hirelings.

The stain of this murder rests upon Prussian militarism and not upon the German people, for it should not be forgotten that possibly the most chivalrous act, which has happened since the beginning of the war, was the erection by a German community, where a detention camp was maintained, of a statue to the imprisoned French and English soldiers who had died in captivity, with the beautiful inscription:

"To our Comrades, who here died for their dear Fatherland."

What could be more chivalrous or present a greater contrast to the assassination of Miss Cavell?

We are advised by Dr. Zimmermann that Miss Cavell was given a fair trial and was justly convicted, but as the proceedings of the trial were secret and as Miss Cavell was denied counsel of her own selection and forbidden to have access in advance of the trial even to the nature of the charges against her, and as we know nothing of the circumstances of her alleged offense except the reports of her judges and executioners, the world will be somewhat incredulous as to whether the trial was as just to the accused as Dr. Zimmermann would have us believe.

The difficulty with this assurance is that the German conception of what is a fair trial differs from that which prevails in Anglo-Saxon countries, just as the German word "Gerechtikeit" does not convey the same mental or moral conception as the English word "justice." "Gerechtikeit" means simply the exercise of the power of the State, and claims no further sanction than its authority. In England, France, and the United States the idea of justice is that an individual has certain fundamental and inalienable rights which even the State cannot override, and none of these fundamental rights have been more highly valued in the whole evolution of English liberty than the rights of a defendant who is charged with crime. Whether guilty or not guilty, he cannot be arrested without a judicial warrant on proof of probable cause; he may not be compelled to testify against himself; he is entitled to a speedy trial and shall be informed in advance thereof of the exact nature of the accusation; his trial shall be public and open, and he shall be confronted with the witnesses against him and have compulsory process for his own defense; in advance of trial he shall have permission to select his own counsel, and shall have the opportunity to confer freely with him.

Each one of these fundamental rights was denied to Miss Cavell.

It is difficult to understand why, in view of the policy of terrorism, which has prevailed in Belgium from the time that the invader first crossed its frontier, the justice from the standpoint of military law should be referred to in Herr Zimmermann's defense. In the official textbook of the General Staff of the German Army the definite policy of terrorizing a conquered country is proclaimed as a military theory. Its leading axiom is that

> "a war conducted with energy cannot be directed merely against the combatants of the enemy State and the positions they occupy, but it will and must in like manner seek to destroy the total intellectual and material resources of the Ruler. Humanitarian claims, such as the protection of men and their goods, can only be taken into consideration in so far as the nature and object of the war permit. Consequently the argument of war permits every belligerent State to have recourse to all means which enable it to obtain the object of the war."

Miss Cavell's fate only differs from that of hundreds of Belgian women and children in that she had the pretense of a trial and presumably had trespassed against military law, while other victims of the rape of Belgium were ruthlessly killed in order to effect a speedy subjugation of the territory. The question of the guilt or innocence of each individual was a matter of no importance. Hostages were taken and shot for the alleged wrongs of others.

Did not General von Bülow on Aug. 22 announce to the inhabitants of Liége that > "it is with my consent that the General in command has burned down the place [Andenne] and shot about 100 inhabitants."

It was the same chivalrous and humane General who posted a proclamation at Namur on Aug. 25 as follows:

> "Before 4 o'clock all Belgian and French prisoners are to be delivered up as prisoners of war. Citizens who do not obey this will be condemned to hard labor for life in Germany. At 4 o'clock a rigorous inspection of all houses will be made. Every soldier found will be shot. * * * The streets will be held by German guards, who will hold ten hostages for each street. These hostages will be shot if there is any trouble in that street. * * * A crime against the German Army will compromise the existence of the whole town of Namur and every one in it."

Did not Field Marshal von der Goltz issue a proclamation in Brussels, on Oct. 5, stating that, if any individual disturbed the telegraphic or railway communications, all the inhabitants would be "punished without pity, the innocent suffering with the guilty"?

Individual guilt being thus a matter of minor importance, Dr. Zimmermann had no occasion on the accepted theory of Prussian militarism to justify the secret trial and midnight execution of Edith Cavell. Indeed, he freely intimates that his Government will not spare women, no matter how high and noble the motive may have been which inspires any infraction of military law, and to this sweeping statement he makes but one exception, namely, that women "in a delicate condition may not be executed." But why the exception? If it be permitted to destroy one life for the welfare of the military administration of Belgium, why stop at two? If the innocent living are to be sacrificed, why spare the unborn? The exception itself shows that the rigor of military law must have some limitation; and that its iron rigor must be softened by a discretion dictated by such considerations of chivalry and magnanimity as have hitherto been observed by all civilized nations. If the victim of yesterday had been an "expectant mother," Dr. Zimmermann suggests that her judges and executioners would have spared her, but no such exception can be found in the Prussian military code. "It is not so nominated in the bond," and the Under Secretary's recognition of one exception, based upon considerations of humanity and not the letter of the military code, destroys the whole fabric of his case, for it clearly shows that there was a power of discretion which von Bissing could have exercised, if he had so elected.

That her case had its claims not only to magnanimity, but even to military justice, is shown by the haste with which, in the teeth of every protest, the unfortunate woman was hurried to her end. Sentenced at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, she was executed nine hours later. Of what was General Baron von Bissing afraid? She was in his custody. Her power to help her country—save by dying—was forever at an end. The hot haste of her execution and the duplicity and secrecy which attended it betray an unmistakable fear that if her life had been spared until the world could have known of her death sentence, public opinion would have prevented this cruel and cowardly deed. The labored apology of Dr. Zimmermann and the swift action of the Kaiser in pardoning those who were condemned with Miss Cavell indicate that the Prussian officials have heard the beating of the wings of those avenging angels of history who, like the Furies of classic mythology, are the avengers of the innocent and the oppressed.

"Greatness," wrote Aeschylus, "is no defense from utter destruction when a man insolently spurns the mighty altar of justice."

This is as true today as when it was written more than two thousand years ago. It is but a classic echo of the old Hebraic moral axiom that "the Lord God of recompenses shall surely requite."

The most powerful and self-willed ruler of modern times learned this lesson to his cost. Probably no two instances contributed so powerfully to the ultimate downfall of Napoleon as his ruthless assassination under the forms of military law of the Duke d'Enghien and the equally brutal murder of the German bookseller, Palm. The one aroused the undying enmity of Russia, and the blood that was shed in the most of Vincennes was washed out in the icy waters of the Beresina. The fate of the poor German bookseller, whom Napoleon caused to be shot because his writings menaced the security of French occupation, developed as no other event the dormant spirit of German nationality, and the Nuremberg bookseller, shot precisely as was Miss Cavell, was finally avenged when Blücher gave Napoleon the coup de grâce at Waterloo. No one more clearly felt the invisible presence of his Nemesis than did Napoleon. All his life, and even in his confinement at St. Helena, he was ceaselessly attempting to justify to the moral conscience of the world his ruthless assassination of the last Prince of the house of Condé. The terrible judgment of history was never better expressed than by Lamartine in the following language:

> "A cold curiosity carries the visitor to the battlefields of Marengo, Austerlitz, Wagram, Leipsic, Waterloo; he wanders over them with dry eyes, but one is shown at a corner of the wall near the foundations of Vincennes, at the bottom of a ditch, a spot covered with nettles and weeds. He says, 'There it is!' He utters a cry and carries away with him undying pity for the victim and an implacable resentment against the assassin. This resentment is vengeance for the past and a lesson for the future. Let the ambitious, whether soldiers, tribunes, or kings, remember that if they have hirelings to do their will, and flatterers to excuse them while they reign, there yet comes afterward a human conscience to judge them and pity to hate them. The murderer has but one hour; the victim has eternity."

With this noble aphorism of Lamartine the case of Edith Cavell could be safely rested, but there is one aspect of the tragedy which especially concerns the honor and dignity of the United States and should receive its swift and effectual recognition.

Her secret trial and hurried execution was a studied affront to the American Minister at Brussels, and therefore to the American nation. It is true that in all he did to save her life he was acting in behalf of and for the benefit of Great Britain, whose interests our Government has taken over in Belgium; but this cannot affect the fact that when Brand Whitlock intervened in behalf of the prisoner, sought to secure her a fair trial, and prevent her execution, and especially when he asked her life as a favor in return for the services our country had rendered Germany and German subjects in the earlier days of the war, he spoke as an American and as the diplomatic representative of the United States.

So secret was Miss Cavell's arrest and so sinister the methods whereby her end was compassed that the American Minister in Belgium was obliged to write on Aug. 31 to Baron von der Lancken, the German Civil Governor of Belgium, and ask whether it was true that she was under arrest. To this the German Military Governor did not even deign to make a reply, although it was clearly a matter of life and death.

The discourtesy of such silence to a great and friendly nation needs no comment, and will simply serve to remind the American people that Germany has never yet replied to another request of our Government that she disavow the massacre of nearly 200 American men, women, and children on the Lusitania.

Not hearing from Baron von der Lancken, our Minister on Sept. 10 again wrote to him and again asked for a reply. He asked for the opportunity "to take up the defense of Miss Cavell with the least possible delay." To this, Baron Lancken deigned to reply by an ex parte statement that Miss Cavell had admitted

> "having concealed in her house various English and French soldiers, as well as Belgians of military age, all anxious to proceed to the front. She also acknowledged having supplied these soldiers with the funds necessary to proceed to the front and having facilitated their departure from Belgium by finding guides to assist them in clandestinely crossing the frontier."

The Baron further answered that her defense had been intrusted (by her Judges) to an advocate by the name of Braun, "who is in touch with the proper German authorities," and added that in view of these facts the German military authorities refused "to allow interviews of any kind with the accused persons." For this reason he refused the request of the American Minister that the counsel of the American Legation, M. Deleval, be permitted to visit Miss Cavell.

Our only knowledge as to whether Miss Cavell had been guilty of these offenses against German military law is from her prosecutors, and thus it will be noted that the only counsel assigned to her was not of her own selection, but was apparently a German who was "in touch with the proper German authorities."

We only know from the same interested source what defense, if any, Miss Cavell made. From one of the inspired sources comes the statement that she freely admitted her guilt, and from her last interview with the English clergyman it would appear that she probably did admit some infraction of military law. But from another German source we learn the following:

> "During the trial in the Senate Chamber the accused, almost without exception, gave the impression of persons cleverly simulating naive innocence. It was not a mere coincidence that two-thirds of the accused were women.
> "The Englishwoman, Edith Cavell, who has already been executed, declared that she had believed as an Englishwoman that she ought to do her country service by giving lodgings in her house to soldiers and recruits who were in peril. She naturally denied that she had drawn other people into destruction by inducing them to harbor refugees when her own institute was overtaxed."

From this meagre information we can only infer that Miss Cavell did admit that she had sheltered some soldiers and recruits who were in peril, and while this undoubtedly constituted a grave infraction of military law, yet it does not present in a locality far removed from the actual war zone a case either of espionage or high treason, and is of that class of offenses which have always been punished on the highest considerations of humanity and chivalry and with great moderation.

The difficulty is that the world is not yet informed what defense, if any, Miss Cavell made, or whether an opportunity was given her to make any. The whole proceeding savors of the darkness of the mediaeval Inquisition.

For some reason that does not appear Herr Braun was not utilized by her Judges to represent her, but another counsel was assigned to her by the name of Kirschen. The extent of his opportunity to represent her—assuming that he was even assigned in good faith to do so—can be illustrated by the fact that when M. Deleval, the legal counsel of the American Embassy, again sought an opportunity to arrange for Miss Cavell's defense he was referred by the authorities to Herr Kirschen, who promptly told our representative that

> "lawyers defending prisoners before a German Military Court were not allowed to see their clients before trial, and were not permitted to see any document of the prosecution."

Herr Kirschen further advised M. Deleval not to carry out his intention of even attending the trial, as this "would cause great prejudice to the prisoner, because the German Judges would resent it."

What an indictment of the Judges by their own appointee! Even to see a representative of the American Government at the trial in the interests of fair play would sway the mind of the court against the prisoner. It reads like the trial scene in "Alice in Wonderland."

Herr Kirschen further assured our representative that he would keep our embassy "informed of all developments in the case," and after giving that express assurance, nothing more was heard from the learned counsel assigned by her Judges to defend Miss Cavell. As the trial was secret, no information is vouchsafed as to whether Herr Kirschen even attended, much less defended, his friendless client. What witnesses appeared against her, what the exact charges were, what efforts the court made to learn the facts, what mitigating circumstances were pleaded, of all these we know nothing. These brave and distinguished soldiers tried her in secret and executed her in secret.

It must be remembered that all this did not take place in the zone of actual warfare. A spy caught in the lines of armies is summarily dealt with of necessity. But Brussels was miles away from the scene of actual hostilities. Its civil courts were open and a civil administration ruled its affairs of such reputed beneficence and efficiency as to evoke the ungrudging admiration of a distinguished college professor who bears the honored name of George B. McClellan. There was therefore no possible excuse under international law for a drumhead court-martial, as this farcical trial plainly was. In our civil war a similar military commission once sought to hold a similar trial in Indianapolis over civilians accused of treason, but our Supreme Court, in the case of ex parte Milligan, sternly repudiated this form of military tyranny.

In that case the Supreme Court said:

> "There are occasions when martial rule can be properly applied. If, in foreign invasion or civil war, the courts are actually closed, and it is impossible to administer criminal justice according to law, then, on the theatre of active military operations, where war really prevails, there is a necessity to furnish a substitute for the civil authority, thus overthrown, to preserve the safety of the army and society; * * * As necessity creates the rule, so it limits its duration; for, if this government is continued after the courts are reinstated, it is a gross usurpation of power. Martial rule can never exist where the courts are open, and in the proper and unobstructed exercise of their jurisdiction. It is also confined to the locality of actual war."

We do not even know the exact charge preferred against Miss Cavell, much less the evidence which supported it. Dr. Zimmermann says that the charge was treason, but Miss Cavell, as a British subject, owed no allegiance to Germany, and, while she could be legally subjected to military law, the technical charge of treason could no more properly be preferred against her than against any French or English soldier. The German military authorities vaguely intimated that the charge was espionage, but the humane act of helping fugitives to escape, while undoubtedly a grave infraction of military law, is not technically or justly the crime of espionage.

All civilized countries, including Germany, have always recognized a difference between high treason, punishable with death, and ordinary treason. The German Strafgesetzbuch thus distinguishes between high treason (hochverrat) and the lesser crime of landesverrat. High treason consists in murdering or attempting to murder a sovereign or Prince of Germany or an attempt by violence to overthrow the Imperial Government or any State thereof. This alone is punishable with death.

While this distinction of the German Civil Code may have no application when military law is being enforced, yet it illustrates a distinction, which all humane nations have recognized, between the treason which seeks to overthrow a State by rebellion and lesser offenses against the authority of a State.

Assuming that Miss Cavell's offense could be regarded in any sense as treasonable, it certainly constituted the lesser offense under the distinction above quoted.

The fact is that Miss Cavell was tried, condemned, and executed for her sympathy with the cause of Belgium and her willingness to save her compatriots from suffering and death. Military necessity—ever the tyrant's plea—demanded a victim further to terrorize the subjugated people. They chose Miss Cavell.

Notwithstanding the request of the American Legation in its letter of Oct. 5 that it be advised not only as to the charges, but also as to the sentence imposed upon Miss Cavell, and the express promise of Herr Kirschen to inform it of all developments, it was kept in ignorance of the fact that sentence of death had been passed upon her. Minister Whitlock only heard this on Oct. 11, and he at once addressed a letter to Baron von der Lancken in which, after stating this fact, he appealed "to the sentiment of generosity and humanity in the Governor General in favor of Miss Cavell," with a view to commutation of the death sentence, and at the same time addressed a similar letter to Baron von Bissing, the Military Governor of Belgium, who again did not deign to give to the American Government even the cold courtesy of a reply.

On the morning of Oct. 11 our Minister heard—not from the German authorities, but from unofficial sources—that the trial had been completed on the preceding Saturday afternoon, and he at once communicated with the Political Department of the German Military Government, and was expressly assured

> "that no sentence had been pronounced and that there would probably be a delay of a day or two before a decision was reached."

The Director of the Political Department (Herr Conrad) gave a further

> "positive assurance that the [American] Legation would be fully informed as to the developments in the case.'

Notwithstanding this direct promise and further "repeated inquiries in the course of the day," no further word reached our Legation, and at 6:20 P. M. it again inquired as to Miss Cavell's fate, and the Director of the Political Department again

> "stated that sentence had not yet been pronounced,"

and he specifically renewed his assurance. Two hours later our Minister from unofficial sources heard that all that had been told him by the Political Department was untrue and that the sentence had been passed at 5 o'clock P. M. and before his last conversation with the Director, and that the execution was to take place that night.

Accordingly the Secretary of the American Legation proceeded at once to Baron von der Lancken and again asked as a favor to this Government that clemency be extended. He brought with him a letter from the American Minister, which reads as follows:

> "My dear Baron:
> "I am too ill to put my request before you in person, but once more I appeal to the generosity of your heart. Stand by and save from death this unfortunate woman. Have pity on her. Your devoted friend,
> "BRAND WHITLOCK."

This note was read aloud to Baron von der Lancken, the very official who had refused to answer the first communication of the Legation with reference to the matter, and he

> "expressed disbelief in the report that sentence had actually been passed and manifested some surprise that we should give credence to any report not emanating from official sources. He was quite insistent in knowing the exact source of our information, but this I did not feel at liberty to communicate to him."

Baron von der Lancken proceeded to express his belief "that it was quite improbable that sentence had been pronounced," and that in any event no execution would follow. After some hesitation he telephoned to the Presiding Judge of the Court-Martial and then reported that the embassy's unofficial information was only too true.

His attention was further called to the express promise of the German Director of the Political Department to inform the American Legation of the sentence, and he was asked to grant the American Government the courtesy of a "delay in carrying out the sentence." Thereupon Baron von der Lancken agreed to call the Military Governor on the telephone. Instead he saw him in person, and a half hour later reported to our Secretary a refusal to interfere with the execution of the sentence. Having done this, he requested the representative of the American Legation to take back the note of our Minister, but as it was an official communication, our representative insisted that he should keep it. Baron von der Lancken, however, was very insistent and refused to accept delivery of the note. The exact reason for this added discourtesy to the American Government is not clear. He had read the note and could not thereafter claim that our Government had not asked for clemency as a favor.

On Oct. 22 there was issued from Brussels a "semi-official" but anonymous statement, charging that in the reports of the Secretary of the American Embassy, from which the above quoted statements are mainly taken, "most of the important events are inaccurately reproduced."

No specification of any inaccuracy is however made, except the general denial "that the German authorities with empty promises put off the American Minister" and also the equally general statement that no promise was given to our embassy to advise it of developments in the case.

A vague, general, and anonymous denial, issued by men who seek to wash their hands of innocent blood, cannot avail against the clear, specific, and circumstantial statement of an American official, who certainly had no political motive to color his statements. The Secretary of our embassy states that on Oct. 11 he made "repeated" inquiries of Herr Conrad, the official in charge of the Political Department of the German Government in Belgium, the last inquiry being at 6:20 P. M. by the clock, (an hour after the victim had been sentenced to death,) and was on each occasion assured that "sentence had not been pronounced" and that "he [Conrad] would not fail to inform us as soon as there was any news."

Does Herr Conrad deny this?

The Brussels "semi-official" statement has the hardihood to state to the world that the American Minister (Brand Whitlock) had admitted that "no such promise or assurance was given," and it places the responsibility upon M. Deleval, the Belgian legal counselor of the American Embassy, but this impudent lie is speedily overthrown by the positive statement of our Minister at Belgium to our Ambassador in London as follows:

> "From the date we first learned of Miss Cavell's imprisonment we made frequent inquires of the German authorities and reminded them of their promise that we should be fully informed as to developments. They were under no misapprehension as to our interest in the matter."

Will the American people or the people of any nation hesitate to accept the clear, positive, and circumstantial statements of Minister Whitlock, Secretary Gibson, and Counselor Deleval, at least two of whom are wholly disinterested in the matter, as against the self-exculpatory, general, and anonymous denials of a "semi-official" press bureau, especially when it is recalled that from the beginning of the great war, the German Foreign Office, with whom military honor is supposed to be almost a religion, has stooped to the most shameful and barefaced mendacity?

When the world recalls how Austrian Ambassadors in Paris, London, and Petrograd made the most emphatic statements that the forthcoming ultimatum to Serbia would be "pacific and conciliatory," and assured the Russian Ambassador that he could therefore safely leave Vienna on his vacation on the very eve of the ultimatum, and when the German Ambassadors in the same capitals gave the most solemn and unequivocal assurances that and later admitted, when the lie had served its purpose by lulling the world into a sense of false security, that it had been fully consulted by its ally before the ultimatum was prepared and had given it a carte blanche to proceed, when these notable examples of Prussian Machiavellism are recalled, little attention will be given to these futile attempts to wash from the shield of German honor the blood of Edith Cavell.

> "the German Government had no knowledge of the text of the American note before it was handed in and had not exercised any influence on its contents,"

One can to some extent understand the Berserker fury which caused a von Bissing to say in effect to this gentle-faced English nurse, "You are in our way. You menace our security. You must die, as countless thousands have already died, to secure the results of our seizure of Belgium"; but can we understand or in any way palliate the attempt to hide the stains of blood on that prison floor of Brussels with a cobweb of self-evident falsehoods?

These stains can never be washed out to the eye of imagination.

> "Let none these marks efface,
> For they appeal from tyranny to God."

In the last interview between our representative and Baron von der Lancken, which took place a few hours before the execution, our representative reminded these Prussian officials

> "of our untiring efforts on behalf of German subjects at the outbreak of the war and during the siege of Antwerp. I pointed out that, while our services had been gladly rendered and without any thought of future favors, they should certainly entitle you to some consideration for the only request of this sort you [the American Minister] had made since the beginning of the war."

Even our Minister's appeal to gratitude and to one of the most ordinary and natural courtesies of diplomatic life proved unavailing, and at midnight the Secretary of the American Legation and the Spanish Minister, who was acting with him, left in despair. At 2 o'clock that morning Miss Cavell was secretly executed.

Even the ordinary courtesy accorded to the vilest criminal, of being permitted before dying to have a clergyman of her own selection, was denied her until a few hours before her death, for the legal counselor of the American Legation on Oct. 10 applied in behalf of this country for permission for an English clergyman to see Miss Cavell, and this, too, was refused, as her jailers preferred to assign her the prison chaplains as well as her counsel. Even the final appeal of our Minister for the surrender of her mutilated body was denied, on the ground that only the Minister of War in Berlin could grant it.

Apart from the brutality of the whole incident there is one circumstance that makes it of peculiar interest to the American people and which gives to it the character of rank ingratitude. Our representative, as above stated, did advise the German officials that a little delay was asked by our Legation as a slight return for the innumerable acts of kindness which our Legation had done for German soldiers and interned prisoners in the earlier days of the war before the German invasion had swept over the land. The charge of ingratitude may rest soundly upon far greater and broader grounds.

This great nation had contributed in money and merchandise a sum estimated at many millions for the relief of the people in Belgium. In so doing it did to the German nation an inestimable service, for when Germany conquered Belgium the duty and burden rested upon it to support its population to the extent that it might become necessary. The burden of supporting 8,000,000 civilians was no light one, especially as there existed in Germany a scarcity of food. As bread tickets were then being issued in Germany to its people, the supplies would have been substantially less if a portion of its food products had been required for the civilian population of Belgium, for obviously the German nation could not permit a people, whom it had so ruthlessly trampled under foot, to starve to death. Every dollar that was raised in America for the Belgian people, therefore, operated to relieve Germany from a heavy burden.

Moreover, when the war broke out, Germany needed some friendly nation to take over the care of its nationals in the hostile countries, and in England, France, Belgium, and Russia the interests of German citizens were assumed by the American Government as a courtesy to Germany, and no one can question how faithfully in the last fourteen months Page in London, Sharp in Paris, and Whitlock in Brussels have labored to alleviate the inevitable suffering to German prisoners or interned civilians.

In view of these services, it surely was not much for the American Minister to ask that a little delay should be granted to a woman whose error, if any, had arisen from impulses of humanity and from considerations of patriotism. To spare her life a little longer could not have done the German cause any possible harm, for she was in their custody and beyond the power of rendering any help to her compatriots. To condemn any human being, even if he were the vilest criminal, at 5 o'clock in the afternoon and execute him at 2 A. M. was an act of barbarism for which no possible condemnation is adequate.

Under these circumstances, it would be incredible, if the facts were not beyond dispute, that the request of the United States for a little delay was not only brutally refused, but that our Legation was deliberately misled and deceived until the death sentence had been inflicted.

This makes the fate of Miss Cavell our affair as much as that of the Lusitania. And yet we have the already familiar semi-official assurance from Washington that while our officials "unofficially deplore the act, officially they can do nothing." Concurrently we are told in the President's Thanksgiving proclamation that we should be thankful because we have "been able to assert our rights and the rights of mankind," and that this "has been a year of special blessing for us," for, so the proclamation adds, "we have prospered while other nations were at war."

I venture to say in all reverence that the God of nations will be better pleased on the coming Thanksgiving Day—which also should be one of penitence and humiliation—if we do a little more in fact as well as in words to safeguard the rights of humanity. Our initial blunder was in turning away the Belgian Commissioners, when they first presented the wrongs of their crucified nation, with icy phrases as to a mysterious day of reckoning in the indefinite future. An act of justice now will be worth a thousand future "accountings" after the long agony of the world is over. "Now is the accepted time, this the day of salvation."

Let our nation begin with the case of Edith Cavell, and demand of Germany the dismissal of the officers who flouted, deceived, and mocked the representative of the United States. That concerns our honor as a nation.

And you, women of America! Will you not honor the memory of this martyr of your sex, who for all time will be mourned as was the noblest Greek maiden, Antigone, who also gave her life that her brother might have the rites of sepulture? Will you not carry on in her name and for her memory those sacred ministrations of mercy which were her lifework?

Make her cause—the cause of mercy—your own!

France, Sobered, Consecrated to War to the End

Owen Johnson Gives His Impressions of the Country, Transformed by the War, and Especially of Paris, No Longer Gay and Light-hearted

By Owen Johnson.

FIRST ARTICLE.

I REMEMBER vividly the night before our arrival at Bordeaux. The portholes were blinded and lights extinguished in the saloons. In the sealed smoking room, by the light of one smoky lamp, groups were prepared to pass the night.

We stood on the forward deck, eagerly straining our eyes into the darkness to catch the first glimpses of the shore lights. For the last hour the night had trembled under strange, furtive glares. Were we accompanied by silent iron escorts, sweeping the mysterious waters with suspicious shafts from their cyclopean eyes, or was it simply the electrical disturbances in the overheated sky?

We waited, still straining ahead in the moist, errant night breeze, feeling the imminence of the stricken land ahead, as though a black curtain were interposed between us and France, country of shocks and sorrow, wondering what the morrow would bring, with the rolling up of these tragic folds on the stage of cruel reality. I remember how acute was this sensation of dramatic suspense, and now that the journey was ending I felt almost a shrinking before the parting of the last veil, fearful of the spectacle which would present itself to me of the France which I had known and loved.

For, when I had thought of France, I had always thought of it as the happiest, fairest land on the earth's surface. I remembered it with the eyes of my early school days as a fairyland of childhood, where fragile, childish illusions were affectionately guarded from the soiling, crushing weight of life's struggles and realism. I remembered it as a land of disciplined beauty, of bright colors, of flowers at every window; a land of friendly animals beside blue-bloused charioteers or running between the wheels in zealous loyalty to man. I remembered its many-tinted fields, its long, military lines of poplars marching by the white, smooth roadsides; its tranquil canals, so shaded and so peaceful; its great-hearted peasantry, singing and laughing, neither miserable nor oppressed, but free and rich, reveling in the beauty of nature and the joy of living.

I knew it, above all, for its love of generous and glorious ideas, and often, knowing it with a more intimate affection than those who, in the quest of some new literary alchemy, sought only the psychopathic analysis of the frothy, mongrel mixture of all races and all parvenus that fatuously believe themselves the voice of Paris, I had passionately defended them from those of my own people who saw only the green, passing scum on the surface, and knew nothing of the deep, clear depths below.

Yet, even with this reverent faith, that night, on the threshold of the great test, I wondered—a little fearful. The nation of the freest, happiest people on the face of the earth had arisen to the test and performed a miracle—but after? Would the intelligence continue as firm as the imagination? Would its resolution remain as heroic, after the long, grinding months of soul exhaustion? Would there be any weakening before the long task still ahead, and the spirit of sublime sacrifice relax into an easy self-deception lulled by the sophistry of a present peace, an armistice which would mean the doom of republican ideas before the rise of a barbaric efficiency tormented to the fanaticism of predestination?

Even if the answer to all these doubts were a glorious affirmative, would the sight of open wounds and a sorrow-ridden country be so vivid that the abiding impression I would take away would be one of ineffaceable melancholy and depression?

All these thoughts crowded into my imagination that last dramatic night, waiting there in the darkness, feeling the undivined horizon growing gradually closer, as scattering pin-pricks of light swept toward us above the mystery of the sea, until shafts of light belched out from a dozen lighthouses and our ears awaited expectantly a following crash, as though these flashes of human lightning must indeed be followed by the roar of cannon-ridden Europe.

My first impression was, as I had feared, one of overwhelming sadness. The winding, incomparably beautiful approach into port, through historic vineyards running to the water's edge, combing the fields with their green ridges; faint, ancient lines of château and church spire; fair villages in red and white trappings; languid barks with colored sails—all were meaningless in my eagerness for the human note.

Everywhere such an absence of youth and sturdy manhood! Children and old men, and, everywhere, women! Such multiplied, insistent black blots of mourning against the rich, young green! Nearer the city, over the docks and through the streets, this absence of men disappeared; only the world seemed in uniform, waiting for a bugle on the air to herd together, to take shape and march endlessly away.

In the station everything was swallowed up in this military note—a churning, curdling meeting of the waters. The long train was filling up with fresh red corpuscles to be pumped through the life veins to the menaced front. The confusion of uniforms was like the babel of tongues — dark-blue coats, blue-gray, khaki, red trousers, and the olive green, sweeping folds of the Zouaves; officers in smart, pearl-blue shell jackets, and others gray and seared with service; bearded, ragged privates, with young, boyish faces.

In this bustle of departure, side by side, was the sobering spectacle of destiny in the worn and stricken figures of the wounded—men on crutches, limping on canes, heads bandaged, arms in slings, an empty trouser leg or a sleeve pinned up, crossing and recrossing those whose turn had now come to face the inexorable cast—those who looked at them steadily, thinking their own thoughts.

Through the young and the maimed a dozen white-robed, charming silhouettes of the ministering nurses of the Red Cross flitted in their busy tasks, bringing the wounded to rooms for temporary bandages, cutting away soiled cloths, substituting fresh, clean ones. In the dark station, so serious, so grim, and so quiet, with its sudden military groups in shadow, these white-robed figures of young women had something so noble and so healing in the grace and dignity of their presence that they seemed to move amid the stern and unlovely grimness of war as the inspiring vision of an artist.

The train moved out to its long flight over the stricken land. A General and a young Sergeant came into my compartment. The first feeling of sadness which had come over me, like a quick intake of the breath, or an uncontrolled rush of tears to the eyes, now deepened as the memory of the crowds remained in my memory. Something had gone out of France for me—the laughter and the bubbling joy of life, which used to rise in high-pitched notes of excitement in every pleasant crowd. There was no faltering of illusions here. What had passed had struck too deep; what was coming lay too near.

Out of this pervading desolation, one impression detached itself, unexpected and gratefully surprising. Though every detail was martial to the eye, the note of militarism was strikingly absent. There was no heel-clicking and clocklike saluting. Generals, Colonels, Captains, noncommissioned officers, and privates brushed by each other in the utmost simplicity, as though in the present necessity the etiquette of parade was too trivial to be noticed. With the growing sense of a nation's sorrow, there came side by side this dawning comprehension of the spirit of France in the perception of the fraternity and democracy in these armies of a republic.

In the dining car we sat down, a party of four—a General, a plain soldier, and an under officer—without the slightest feeling of unease, the General answering a chance question I addressed to the private, scrupulously and politely offering us the first opportunity at each dish passed. This utter simplicity was too natural to be even noticed by them; it was an impression that was never to leave me, a feeling of the sympathy, charity, and the kinship of a great stricken family.

At every city, General X. drew my attention to converted factories, the red flare of furnaces leaping out of the obscurity, stacked heaps of iron tubes rising like honeycombs.

"Shells for the front, for our busy little 75s."

"And there are many women at work there?" I asked, perceiving, to my surprise, in the feverish insect activity, the faces of young girls.

"At least half, sometimes more," and he added reverently, "what women!"

The region of vineyards fell behind. We entered a Land of Canaan, of glorious harvests. Never have I seen a more crowded land. Down to the iron boundary of the roadbed itself came the swarming fields of wheat and oats, crowding the smooth white roads, as though poised to swallow them up in the mad, leaping joy of production. Not a plot of ground, not fifty feet square, but was doing its duty for the sons who loved and defended it. The fair land of France itself seemed fighting for its armies in this gold and green output spilling over the land—these young generations of the soil coming eagerly forth, like the young generations of men that would grow up to defend their homes in future wars.

Through the mellowing wheat the poppies drenched the field in sanguine stains—a vision of far-off battlefields! As deep as we could see, ceaselessly, beyond each succeeding horizon, this golden flood rolled gloriously away, rustling like a calm sea caressed by zephyrs, seeming to overrun everything, inundating the land, submerging clustered trees and farmhouses, and the tiny villages far off seemed to sink beneath the rising tide.

Through this richness everywhere were dotted active, sombre spots of human beings, like thronging bees, tireless and greedy. Only, when seen close to, a generation was missing. Young women, wives, mothers, the old folks—so old and so bent at times that movement seemed impossible—the children of 6 and 7, boys of 14 and 15; but of men in the mellowness of age, not a sign! Men there were, dotting the banks at every clustered hamlet—but bandaged, or on crutches—their duty done, or struggling back to strength and a new summons.

At every station at which we stopped—great city or village of a hundred souls—it was the same story—soldiers, healed, or soldiers recalled, returning to the front, and, by their sides, women in black. Never shall I forget the look on the faces of these women, turning away to hide the coming tears, or standing immovable as images, staring sternly ahead, dry-faced, seeing visions, imprinting in their memories a last look, to bear down the empty future.

At Poictiers, a score of boyish figures in clean, grayish uniforms, were sprinkled in the worn crowd of shaggy veterans. I passed close to them. They were the recruits of 19, going off to their years of preparation. Such serious, exalted, boyish faces, standing apart to listen to the last calm words of exhortation from the black-clad mothers who had given so deeply of their human store, so unflinching in their loyalty, so ready to give until the end, to keep the fair name of France untarnished! Already, through the tightening at my heart, there had begun a sense of exaltation, a surging pride in human nature, looking on these boys of 19, so reverent and so earnest before the sudden summons to manhood and the privilege of dying.

The wounded passed us in long trains from the front, the compartments choked with soldiers back for a few weeks' recuperation in the open homes of the south; other cars, significantly quiet, with glimpses of immovable bodies stretched among the straw. On these faces of men who had lived among the dying and seen death pass a hundred times by their side there was an expression in the eyes such as I had never seen. It was as though what they have looked upon had been so hideous that the memory haunts them still, leaving every nerve quivering with a supernatural fright. At times on a young face this expression was like a child's—a child in its first conception of sorrow, vaguely conscious that such a thing as death exists, frightened and trying to comprehend what this thing must be.

At Poictiers, a group of young wives with their children came into our compartment. They were in black, even to a golden-haired little girl of 11, on whom it seemed to set so heavily. The mothers began instantly on their work of rolling bandages; each had from ten to twenty convalescents quartered in her home. Hour after hour the same panorama unfolded—at every stop, a man departing, a woman remaining behind, her handkerchief to her eyes. Through the whole land there seemed to be but two uniforms and but two colors—drab war and black resignation.

At Paris—the gay, joyous, electric city I knew—my first impression was of great multitudes suddenly hushed and sobered, a quiet, profound silence, yet, over all, a pervading calm and an inflexible resolve. Imagine, if you can, a whole nation confronted by the certainty of death on a fixed date; that irrevocably in one month it must perish, one and all, and how, face to face with the final reckoning, it would set to work to prepare itself; the stillness and suspense in the soul, the wiping out of earthly vanities and petty contentions under the awed sense of a common fate. Imagine that, and you will realize the impression France made on me that first day.

For several days this sensation continued. Paris seemed like one great family united in a common grief. Bright colors were so completely absent from the avenues that it seemed a world in drab; even the courtesans, in restaurant or trailing the street, were sombrely attired in black or dark-blue tailored suits, without a suspicion of coquetry in hat or blouse. In the restaurants, where formerly a profligate cosmopolitan society had spilled its wealth, I seemed to be dining in a railroad restaurant; not even a dinner jacket was to be seen among the men, not a display of jewelry among the women, or an attempt at décolleté; no gayety and no laughter; conversation in low-pitched voices, as though solicitous of the feelings of those who might be in grief beside them.

At 10 o'clock, everything was deserted, and a silent clearing of tables, and chairs stacked for the night, with a sudden darkening of the streets and a few picketed lights shaded against the approach of Zeppelins above. The walk home, up the Champs Elysées, seemed, indeed a ghostly voyage through Elysian fields, with bodiless shadows whispering at our sides. Above, in the clear night, as we looked, suddenly a star seemed to detach itself from a constellation and come sweeping across the sky like a comet of destruction, then a whirr like the buzzing of an enormous darning needle; and we realized that aloft in the night a sentinel was keeping watch over Paris.

Gradually, however, as I began to see underneath the surface, passing behind a hundred scenes, I perceived that this was not a life of stagnation, but a warning existence of consecration. By the end of my first week in Paris the feeling of depression had completely disappeared, never to return again. Instead, I found a rare exaltation of the soul, a happiness at discovering unsuspected beauties in our common humanity. The feeling that remains today is one of thankfulness to have been privileged to live in such moments, to have known the heroism and the devotion of which men and women are capable.

This Paris was an orderly Paris—a strange city, without violence and crime, where women passed unprotected on their errands of mercy, along ill-lighted streets and parks of darkness, over obscure bridges looking down on the Seine, that flows like a river of the dead, passages that a year ago, under a thousand searching lights, would have exposed them to insult and violence at every step. In the gray of the coming morning, now, where once revelers returned after long nights of dissipation, women of the best society, old and young, cross each other at the early passage of the milk wagons, returning from long vigils at the hospitals, or arriving for a day of ministering to the suffering.

We went one night into the Folies Marigny on our way home—a lugubrious, revealing experience. A quarter of the orchestra was filled; a sprinkling in the gallery. One would have thought the crowd assembled for a memorial service. A mimic impersonated a dozen of the popular heroes—Foch, Galliéni, French, and the idol of the nation, Joffre—result, not the slightest outburst of high-strung enthusiasm; a generous round of hand-clapping, nothing more. The game is not a game for children, nor can they be tricked into children's displays. Each spectator had the look of having made up his mind never to return again. In this former centre of frivolity, frivolity sunk away, crushed and defeated.

At each hotel, at each department store, a great tablet was displayed of the employes who had gone to their duty, and underneath the record of each—wounded on such a date; mentioned in general orders; promoted; a prisoner; dead on the field of honor. Along the Champs Elysées, by the Punch and Judy theatres and the merry-go-rounds, the children seemed to have come from one vast orphan asylum. Yet this open and reverent display of mourning gives a national solidarity, a feeling of unity in sorrow, that runs through all ranks and makes the individual loss perhaps easier to bear, as it unifies the inflexible determination to win in the end.

How many times during these ten days' waiting to go to the front, on visits to hospitals, depots for ecloppes, national dinners, ateliers of great shops, maternity reliefs, a dozen ouvroirs where women in hundreds were sewing for a bare 1.50f. a day, did I receive the invariable answer to my question:

"And, after all, no flinching? The war must go on?"

"Till it is ended, once for all, Monsieur. We must think of our children."

"And you have not lost courage?" I asked involuntarily, moved at the spectacle of this patient toiling that hardly paid for the daily bread, which has gone on now ten long months.

A mother gave me the answer—a mother who had given one son already and had another at Arras, in the bloodiest trenches.

"We women must keep up our courage, Monsieur, to encourage our men."

Not even America so ardently loves and longs for peace as France—peace for her children! Yet not a woman in the throngs I questioned gave me an unSpartan answer. So inflexible is their pride of country, so consecrated their resolution, that if a Ministry should attempt to betray France with an illusory peace, in the absence of men, the women, I believe, would rise and make a revolution! I will quote but one of a hundred letters shown me, without comment, for comment would be futile. It is from a mother to the head of a great ammunition factory, where her two sons have been transferred from the front to give their trained services.

I have just learned that you have asked the Superintendent to keep my sons away from the most dangerous experiments in the charging of the shells. I can't tell you how offensive this demand is to me. I consider that my sons should go where there is the most danger to be incurred.

They should do so, first, because they are the nephews of one of the owners. Their duty is to give an example of courage to the employes who may be haunted by the memory of the terrible catastrophes which have taken place lately, which were the result of the inexperience and imprudence of those who were directing the operations. They should assist in all such experiments, even were they more dangerous than they are in reality, because my sons are soldiers.

You know that I only consented to advise their leaving the front because you assured me that their presence in the factories would be more important than in the trenches; and that there would be certain dangers to be met. The first accident that occurred at the factory decided me to grant your request. I beg of you not to change now in any way the duties of my sons.

When war was declared I felt clearly all the sorrows which might visit us, and I promised myself that I would give my children an example of courage. My daughters will not see me overwhelmed by misfortunes; my sons know with what pride I have seen them and wish to see them face the worst dangers.

Sorrow has visited both you and me already in its cruelest form. Do not let us ask for pity. Let us go to the end of the Calvary without flinching!

I will not give the signature, for in justice, if I gave it, it should be signed—

ANY MOTHER IN FRANCE.

The "Machine-Gun Man of the Princess Pats"

Tracy Richardson, Adventurous Young American Who Has Seen Service in Mexico and Nicaragua, Getting Famous with the Canadians in Europe

FROM being full Colonel in Mexico, Major in Nicaragua, Captain or Lieutenant somewhere else, to becoming enlisted man in the machine-gun company of the famous Princess Patricia Regiment of Canada, might be considered by many as a military demotion. But Tracy Richardson, "the machine-gun man of the 'Princess Pats,'" as he is known in the armies of the Allies, does not so consider it, and the fact that he is now generally recognized as the greatest machine-gun operator in Canada's famous regiment of heroes is considered a crowning honor by this Missouri lad of 26 years. Moreover, he should know, for into his short life has been crowded the full score of adventure, excitement, good-fellowship, and all-around experience that has come the way of any "soldier of fortune," even one of twice Richardson's years.

Wherever the cannon booms and the rifles bark, this American boy, who embodies in real life the type of moving picture hero or the soldier of fortune one reads about but never sees, is pretty sure to turn up sooner or later—and it is generally sooner. Along the Rio Grande he is known by thousands of the adventurous souls who populate that picturesque and very troublesome stretch of territory. From Brownsville to Nogales there is not a dugout or an adobe hut that does not know him. Army officers of the United States will tell you that he is the real thing, brave as a lion, gentle as the gentlest woman, and considerate of every one, except possibly himself.

His friends are legion, and among them are the Commander in Chief of the United States Atlantic Fleet, General Scott, the Chief of the General Staff of the Army, and General Fred Funston, the little Kansas fighter now managing the Mexican border situation for Uncle Sam. In Mexico he was the crack machine-gun man of the whole country, and the same was true of him when he was fighting in Central America or elsewhere where revolutions are the fashion.

So it came about that when Europe went to war Tracy lost no time in "hiking" to Canada. The Princess Patricias had been recruited to war strength and were about to sail. To the Colonel commanding went Richardson. Modestly he told his story, a letter or two from some American friends were presented, and when a few days later the Princess Pats sailed for France and death and glory, Richardson was a member of the machine-gun section.

The Canadians quickly found out that he was the real thing when it came to fighting, and that his peer as a machine-gun operator did not exist. For months his American friends heard not a word from him. Then came a few letters bringing the welcome information that he was alive but "full of holes," and that he was convalescing in a British hospital and was fretfully waiting the time when the doctors would let him go to the front and the machine guns of the Princess Pats.

Down in El Paso, in Vera Cruz, at Del Rio, at Nogales, in Central America, where Tracy's name was a household word, his friends had heard that he was dead; that he had "gone to glory," as one of them put it, fighting to the last in the very face of a vicious German assault. Then came the news from Tracy himself that he was still very much alive although "considerably holed up," as he referred to the three wounds from which he was recovering when he wrote the letter in question late in August.

"My Central American experience," Richardson wrote from a hospital at Manchester, England, "although primary experience in a military sense, taught me many things which have helped me in the campaign. It taught me some principles which most every one thought would never be used in modern warfare, but which are being used every day here, and it taught me how to take care of myself physically, which is most important. Mexico taught me much which has come in handy here, bombs and such like, and all the time machine guns; how to work them to get the most good out of them, and so on."

He writes thus of the battle in which he was wounded:

"About the middle of April, about 6 o'clock, I sat about 100 yards from an English battery of 18-pounders. We were waiting for our transport wagons to come up to take back our guns to the town of Ypres, where we were to rest for a few days. Just a corporal and myself had remained behind to watch the guns while the others had gone to the town, about seven miles away.

"Suddenly, just as it was getting dark, we could hear a dull explosion, and then it seemed as though a million guns had opened fire. The Germans had exploded a mine under Hill 60 and covered a gas attack with artillery.

"The English batteries were ordered to open fire, and the noise was something fierce, and all along the line the sky was lighted up with star shells (magnesia lights) for illuminating the ground around the trenches. Our transport arrived at this time, and we left on the 'double,' for shells were falling all over the road. However, after many close calls, we arrived at our billet in the old Belgian cavalry barracks in Ypres and secured a night's rest.

"In the morning the noise was just as bad, and during the next day two shells of 17½-inch calibre fell just in front of our billet, doing no harm, however. Six-inch shells fell in the town all day, and a number of soldiers and civilians were killed and wounded. The next day the 17½-inch shells fell all day long at intervals of fifteen minutes. You would hear a most unearthly scream, then a gigantic explosion, and a big building would go down in a pile of brick and dust, burying whoever might be near. The third day we had to leave our billet for the open field. The shellfire increased. That night we marched back to the trenches, and it was a relief to escape from that town.

"Then began a long stay of fourteen days in the trenches. We were safe enough, for we were too close to be shelled, but we lost a number of men in our support trenches. All this time the battle was going on on both sides of us, but had left us untouched. But on May 3 they had pushed the part of the line held by the French so far back that the Canadians had to retire. This left our division, the Twenty-seventh, in very great danger of being cut off and captured. So we had to retire, which movement we accomplished without loss on the night of the 3d.

"Early on the morning of the 4th the Huns began to shell our trenches, and their infantry advanced, but did not attack. Our machine-gun section came in for special attention from the German artillery. Time and again our guns were dismounted, buried, dug out and brought into action again. Our numbers began to decrease; our trench became a shambles full of dead, wounded, broken guns and equipment. It did not seem possible that a human being could live.

"I was wounded in the back early in the morning by a piece of shell which struck me between the shoulders and plowed down my back and lodged just over my hip bone, where it still remains. About noon I caught a piece of shell through the right leg. By this time we had only one man on the gun who was unwounded. At 5 o'clock the Germans scored a direct hit on our gun with a six-inch shell, and the gun was gone, and I had another wound in the right leg. Our gun now being gone, and since I was beginning to get weak from the loss of blood, I started to leave the trench by way of the communication trench, making for some dugouts in the rear, where our dressing station was located. I will never forget that trip through that strip of trench. Instead of a trench, it was a mass of shell carriers and dead and wounded.

"All around you, men, or what had been men, were to be seen. Some of these poor chaps you had known for months and had come to have a great affection for, and yet not one thing could you do for them. In some places my heart was sickened at the sights I saw. In some of these 'places of the dead' the bodies of our poor fellows were piled four and five deep. I passed a machine-gun platoon—that is, the ghastly wreck of what had been one of the most gallant machine-gun sections of our force. The gun had been destroyed, and about it lay the men, most of them dead, and a few left, but badly wounded. But I could do nothing, and I kept on.

"Finally, I made the dugout. Just how I managed to do so perhaps I shall never know. When darkness came—and never was darkness more welcome—I and my wounded comrades started back to our hospital dressing station, and as we made our way the Germans spotted us, even in the darkness, and opened on us with their machine guns. The night we spent in the dressing station, and next morning we were shelled out of it and had to walk all the way back to Ypres, all the time under a heavy fire.

"I was sent to a hospital at Rouen, where they kept me for twenty-three days, and then sent me over here to England, where the folks talk 'American,' and where they are all good to you. I have been here ever since, and the day is drawing near for my return to the front.

"I am pretty well shot up, but am not a 'goner' by a long shot. They may order me before a medical board when I get back to Flanders, and should they rule me out of action for good, I'll come back home to Texas and get ready perhaps for Mexico. Who can tell? From the little I hear, things seem to be up and doing in Mexico, and maybe the bubble will 'bust' yet.

"There are some of our old friends over her, among them Fred Palmer, who is with our headquarters, I am told. I hope to see him soon. General Scott wrote me a letter full of kindness and good wishes, and wished me a rapid recovery. He is a fine soldier, is General Scott. They don't make 'em any better. Well, this is enough for one time. Remember me to the fellows in El Paso."

What the Ballot That I Had Did Not Do for Me

Well-Known Writer and Lecturer Writes of Her Experiences with and Without the Vote and Frankly Tells Why Suffrage Was a Failure in Her Own Case

By Anna Steese Richardson.

THE ballot did not insure me a profitable position. I had to start with other unskilled, untrained workers at a wage of $5 per week.

The ballot did not increase my wages nor effect my promotion. I had to compete with other workers and outclass them.

The ballot did not improve the conditions under which I worked. I risked my life in firetraps, precisely as the ballotless woman of New York do today.

The ballot did not endow me with the ability to vote intelligently. I had to acquire this by study, investigation, and bitter experience.

The ballot did not insure me the respect of men for my opinions, political or personal. I had to earn this by the quality of the opinions and by my conduct among business men.

The ballot did not give me justice. I had to fight for this in the court, by the aid of a lawyer, as men must.

The ballot did not bring happiness. I had to achieve this, as every woman must, with or without the ballot.

A small minority of women in the State of New York is asking its legislators to grant the so-called right of suffrage to the great majority of women. As is usual under such circumstances, the great majority is not being consulted. If it was, and if it could express a composite opinion, it would probably pray to be delivered from the responsibility of voting. But the great majority is not spectacular, therefore it is not exploited.

I belong to the unpicturesque majority. I believe I have the right to speak for it, because I have enjoyed those particular privileges supposed to come only by and through the ballot. I have tasted economic independence. I have drawn the same wages as men, provided, of course, that I have delivered the same quality of work. I have deposited my ballot in the same box which received that of the man who carried coal into my cellar and of the man who accepted my note at his bank, charging me the same rate of interest he charged my male neighbor. I have voted several members of my sex into comfortable political berths.

Still I have no desire to vote again, for which state of mind I offer three reasons:

1. I lack the time to study, intelligently, proposed legislation, local political conditions, and the records and qualifications of candidates. By experience I know the futility, if not the danger, of the unthinking, unintelligent vote.

2. I decline to place myself in the large class of New York male voters who make no study of political economy nor of the city's needs, but who exercise their "privilege" blindly and on strict party lines.

3. I know that whatever good my vote might accomplish will be counteracted a thousand times by the ballots of those women who vote according to orders from their own unscrupulous men folk, or who sell their votes, or who are voted en masse by that mighty power, Police Headquarters—the ring.

Such reasons may be construed by advocates of suffrage as an admission of weakness, selfishness, or inefficiency. My conviction that woman suffrage does not work the greatest possible good for the largest possible number is founded on experiences which demanded strength, unselfishness, and efficiency.

Twenty-three years ago, in Colorado, I marched and spoke in the interest of woman suffrage. I was of the rank and file in a small city, but my youthful enthusiasm was worthy of Fifth Avenue and Carnegie Hall. And, like so many women who march today in New York, I was able to do this because there was a man who worked while I marched. I was able to address evening meetings, because that same man stayed home with the babies. We had a most amicable arrangement. He enjoyed the privilege of attending a certain number of lodge meetings each month, and I an equal number of suffrage rallies. On the remaining evenings we tended the babies jointly. I do not recall that the word "feminism" was included in our domestic vocabulary, but we lived it.

The same conditions prevail in New York today. The women who do regular work for suffrage must be paid for it, or they have the leisure to campaign because of a competency inherited from some mere male ancestor who accumulated it, or because today some man is working that they may march and motor and talk for suffrage. During the past few months I have heard many smartly tailored women cry out against man-made laws and the enslavement of women, and demand economic independence. And I have returned to the domain of money-making to find their husbands chained to the hardest taskmaster of modern civilization—"making more for the inefficiently managed home."

And, watching New York's highly emotional and picturesque campaign for suffrage, I realize that history in Colorado twenty-three years ago is repeating itself here today. The same soap boxes and the same arguments concerning the woman in the home and out of it, the moral influence of woman in politics and the unsexing of woman through the coarsening voting booth! An automobile, perhaps, instead of the front seat of a spring wagon or the tail end of a cart, but the same casuistic reference to the classing of women with the feebleminded, the insane, and the convicts.

New and yellower banners and more artistic billboards, but the same outcry against the opponents of woman suffrage as these who belong in the Dark Ages. Even a number of the same speakers and leaders sent out twenty-three years ago from the national headquarters, a trifle grayer as to hair, but not a whit less fanatical and sincere in their fanaticism. And, last but not least, the same old prophecies concerning the betterment of conditions through votes for women. The women of New York today are being promised exactly what was promised the women of Colorado twenty-three years ago.

What the great majority of New York women want to know is whether this promise can be kept, whether these prophecies can be fulfilled. Did the advocates of equal suffrage in Colorado "make good"? What will the average woman gain if the woman suffrage amendment is passed in Albany next month? Exactly what will the ballot mean to the woman in the home, whose interests centre in its economic problems and its children, and to the woman in gainful occupations with her problems of industrial competition, wages, hours, strikes, and sanitary conditions?

The questions uppermost in the minds of New York women today do not deal with glittering generalities like a single standard of morality, woman's moral influence in the voting booth, the right of the married woman to be known by her maiden name, but with individual, personal, one might almost say selfish, problems. Fortunately for her country and her home, the average woman of the great majority takes an extremely individual, personal, and narrow view of any national or State question.

"What will it mean for me and mine? The rest of the world is unimportant."

The vote is one more responsibility added to those the average woman is already carrying. It is not a privilege. Depositing a strip of paper marked with painstaking "X's" will not insure the wife and mother better government in her town, better schools for her children, better sanitation on her block and in her home, better protection for her husband and her children at their toil. To secure such ideal conditions she must not only vote, but she must know why and for what she is voting. And, having voted for civic betterment, she must co-operate with the authorities.

It is not enough that she vote for a man who has fathered city playgrounds for her children, better factory laws for her husband, and the filtration of the water her family drinks. She must learn something about the candidate's record, his reputation for living up to his promises, and the record of the party which nominated him.

As an individual housekeeper, she must then do her part in carrying out the sanitary laws for which she has voted. In New York today men make sanitary laws, and housekeeping women break them. What profiteth the family health if a housekeeper vote for a whitewing appropriation and continue to dump her garbage in her back yard or alley?

The ballot properly used will give New York mothers practical control of the public schools if they are willing to assume the responsibility. This should lead to the correction of many present evils, from extravagant contracts for badly designed school buildings to the appointment of teachers for merit, not for the masculine votes they can influence.

In Colorado the schools are the spoils which fall to women politicians. The State and most of the County Superintendents are women. Yet in school buildings, in educational methods, in the teacher-spirit, Colorado is no more progressive than man-ridden Connecticut.

The ballot in the hands of women should raise the age of consent, improve child labor laws, better conditions in reformatories and all institutions to which children are committed, and safeguard the family circle by what is known as an Employe Compensation bill. But Colorado with its women voters has not the highest age of consent. Last year it rejected the establishment of a Child Welfare Commission. It is so far behind the times that it still commits homeless, dependent children to institutions instead of maintaining a home-finding society, and the inhuman treatment of boys in reformatories became such a scandal that the press, not the women voters, demanded a rigid investigation and a general cleaning out of the politicians and their cruel employes. And its women took no interest in the effort to secure an employe compensation law.

Equal suffrage never has, in Colorado or elsewhere, prevented strikes and labor troubles. It will not work the miracle in New York. So long as greed thrives on man's necessity to work, capital and labor will clash, and so long as women, ignorant of economics, defying the law of supply and demand, offer their services for less than men—and other women—ask, the ballot will not raise their wages nor adjust their differences. Men as well as women worked in the Triangle shirt waist factory in New York, where an infamous fire wiped out the lives of many young girls, but they did not use their ballots to secure and enforce adequate fire-protection. Will women do any better?

Colorado was by no means the first State to pass a minimum wage law, and in both labor laws and wages it is behind Massachusetts, where laws are entirely man-made.

The ballot does not count unless it is used wisely.

There is nothing more amusing to those of us who have voted and watched the effect of the ballot on the home-making woman than the claims of some anti-suffragists that suffrage unsexes the woman, takes her from her home and weakens her interest in her children. The problem of the politician in Colorado is to persuade this home-making creature to use her ballot at all. It requires considerable ingenuity to coax her to the polls, let alone to a political meeting. Understand, now, I am speaking of the mass of Colorado women, who correspond to the unconsulted, uninterested majority of New York women who are having equal suffrage agitated and lobbied for them without their aid or consent. I am not speaking of the women politicians and office holders in Colorado with whom the ballot is strictly a business proposition, nor yet of the more fashionable club women in the larger cities who make a fad of politics but who wield little practical power.

Here in New York we will have the same three classes of women voters—the women politicians and office holders who will be recruited from the ranks of the present agitators and leaders; the polite politicians who in reality will know nothing about practical politics and whose ranks will include very cultured and charming ladies, and the great majority, who will be curious concerning their first voting experience, will spoil various ballots, and then will become, in all things political, purely apathetic. The practical politicians will know how to manipulate the undesirable female vote. Will the polite politicians show the same enthusiasm for educating the great majority and imbuing them with a sense of ballot responsibility that they show today for invading Wall Street, parading on Fifth Avenue, and commandeering the motor cars of rich men for suffrage hikes?

The ballot for women is a grave responsibility and a heavy expense for a few agitators to urge upon a State, unless they are sure that the women whom they claim to represent will use the power of voting. It opens the polls to the women of the undesirable element and the uneducated foreign element, and thereby doubles the power of political rings now controlling the same elements among male voters. It practically doubles the cost of election. And yet its sponsors are doing nothing toward the education of that very desirable voting element, the great majority of home-making—alas! economically dependent—women whose votes will be controlled by the men who love, honor, and cherish—or beat them! For every progressive woman who uses her ballot according to the Rand School of Political Economy or the Columbia University system, there will be a thousand who will make their mark on a ballot where it will do the most good according to the light of a district leader or a ward heeler.

No one can appreciate the gravity of the situation in New York today more than we who were pioneer voters in Colorado. We meant to use our votes to high ends. We meant to turn out the rascals. We meant to purify politics, But we did not know how. So we fairly girdled our State with corrupt rings. This was not because we were women, but because we used our votes to no better advantage than did the unthinking or unintelligent man, thereby doubling the power of the grafters.

I recall voting for one of my neighbors, the husband of a personal friend, who had been a most genial host in his home. That was guarantee enough for me. He was a good husband, a kind and generous father. Not until long after I had cast my vote did I realize that this most agreeable man was the leader and principal profit-sharer in the most corrupt group that ever held a county in its grasp. But then I deserved no more condemnation than the man in New York who told me quite seriously that he would not vote for a certain candidate because the latter's first name was Vivian.

"Vivian? That's a fine name for a real man, isn't it? There must be something wrong with him."

No looking into the man's record, no thought for his qualifications, just masculine prejudice against the Christian name bestowed upon the poor fellow by his inconsiderate parents. If a woman had followed the same argument in voting her conduct would have been ascribed to biological inequality or emotional instability.

The use to which a vote is put is the only thing which counts, whether the hand that casts it be male or female.

Another time I voted for a man who threw a large volume of trade my husband's way. In the light of later events, I saw that he was unworthy of any citizen's vote. Also I was made to feel a renegade and a backslider in the woman's reform club of which I was a member. But what would you? The candidate's patronage supported my children. Shall a woman withhold the ballot from the hand that feeds and clothes the children she has borne?

Dishonest? Misuse of my voting privilege? Not at all as I looked at it then, in my inexperience and irresponsibility. Today, yes, because I understand the power of the ballot for good and evil, because years develop the sense of responsibility. And thousands of women, given the ballot in New York now, will use it to no higher ends, until they have been educated either by the press or by bitter experience in political economy and in appreciation of the ballot's power.

And because I was not prepared to become a voter, because there were thousands of women like me, the first result of equal suffrage in Colorado was to deliver the State into the hands of rings and grafters who belonged in the Tammany Wigwam with the tiger and the Tammany leaders.

This was followed by a spasm of reform, due largely to the emotional and impassioned devotion of the women of Denver for Judge Lindsey. The State brought forth women's clubs instead of millionaire mine owners and bad men. More rascals went out and less came in. There was a general awakening of the public conscience, due not so much to the woman vote as to the fact that Colorado was dropping its youthful crudities and taking on habits of custom and tradition —home-building instead of shaft-sinking.

Today there is no more delightful sight than a Denver woman's club discussing local politics and candidates in the palm room of the Hotel Savoy. Nevertheless, when I was sent to Denver several years ago to secure certain information for an Eastern magazine, I tarried but a short time among the white-gloved reformers at the Savoy. The information I wanted was possessed by a small, spry, bright-eyed, wrinkled little Irishwoman who is a practical politician, and who will be able to retire when she so elects, to enjoy the comforts which money can buy.

The theory of equal suffrage is altogether right and just. Women should not be taxed without representation. Women are mentally and morally, if not physically, the equal of men. The weakness in the present campaign is that the agitators and leaders can take the 3,000,000 women of voting age in this State to the suffrage trough, but they cannot make them drink. Woman suffrage is valuable to a State and a people only when it is used intelligently. Because the leaders cannot deliver an intelligent voting body of women to the State which passes the amendment, they have no right to promise the reforms with which their literature and speeches bristle.

When forced by necessity into the wage-earning field, even with the ballot in my hand, I had to start at the bottom of the industrial ladder and fight my way up as desperately as if I had lived in a State where woman was denied the privilege of voting. Never once did my right to vote affect my working hours, my salary, my opportunities for advancement, the conditions under which I worked. Perhaps conditions have changed in Colorado after twenty-three years of votes for women, but allowing for such influence on the lot of the woman in the home and in gainful occupations, which even suffrage leaders have not yet been able to prove, New York must pass through the same period of storm and evolution.

The great majority who read complacently of the noble efforts made in their behalf by suffrage leaders should waken to a realization that there is work ahead for them—the work of preparation for using the ballot. The factory hand and the business girl must understand that results of suffrage, even in the hands of intelligent, earnest women, are slow. The mere ballot in their hands will work no miracle in salaries, in hours, in the conditions under which work is done, nor in the morals of the men they would marry. Strikes and rumors of strikes will continue in New York as they have continued in Colorado. Competition will not be lessened by the woman's right to vote. Men who can evade building and fire laws will continue to do so, ignoring her vote as they have ignored her father's and her brother's.

Finally, in their mad desire to advance the "cause," the agitators have done the women of New York a grave wrong in creating and fostering sex antagonism. They have accused the men of New York of breaking every commandment in the decalogue of good citizenship. They have shouted against the man-made laws of New York, yet on examination these prove that, instead of discriminating against women, men lawmakers have given us a distinct advantage in all questions which concern the rights of the mother over her earnings, her children, her property rights, and her responsibility for debts incurred. They have proved their own unfitness to make laws for both men and women by announcing that they will overturn the political system built by men and substitute not a government for both men and women but for women only!

This is a great injustice to both men and women at a time when women are about to emerge triumphant from a half century of adjustment to new and trying economic conditions. The bitterness felt by men which followed the first invasion of industrial fields by women is fading. The bigger, broader nature of the male creature is accepting the fact that the presence of the woman, driven from her home by social and economic conditions in the various fields of industry, trades, and professions where he once reigned supreme, is inevitable and not altogether undesirable. He has decided that if the woman will play fair so will he.

I question whether we women, similarly placed, would have been as generous.

During more than twenty years of economic independence, sex discrimination has never reared its head in my path. No man has ever refused to pay me full value for my work. Every large opportunity has come to me through some man who considered neither sex attraction nor sex antagonism—only the task and the fitness of the woman to perform it.

There is no room in the scheme of woman's upward progress for sex antagonism, not even for sex independence. What the women of New York, of all America, need is interdependence between the sexes, that men and women may go to the polls to work for their common good, not to rend each other.

The majority of women, through biological evolution and the world-old instinct of wifehood and motherhood, their emotionalism and their tremendous capacity for loving, find in marriage, children, and the home their highest and most satisfying happiness. This mass of women, overwhelming in numbers and influence, resents the efforts of a few women who have already satisfied their craving for wifehood and motherhood, or who, through constitutional abnormality, are denied those natural relations, to widen the social breach between the sexes and thus to interfere with the normal woman's fondest, finest hopes.

So long as suffrage leaders offer the so-called enslavement of women as a reason for conferring the right to vote upon women they raise a false issue. The woman who is a slave to man without the ballot will continue to be his slave with it. This is constitutional, emotional weakness in the individual woman which will not be rectified by a mere slip of paper.

And so long as women agitators employ sex antagonism as an argument for equal suffrage they befog the real issue, which is:

"Do the women of New York want the ballot and will they use it?"

I believe that I voice the convictions of that silent, unrepresented majority when I answer:

"Not yet. Give us time to adjust ourselves to the new economic conditions, to our new relations with men as wage-earners. Let us learn the value, the power of the ballot and how to use it."

And until they have done this experience has taught me that they will not use the ballot, even if it is forced upon them.

Interesting Facts from Many Lands

A SCHOOL for farm mechanics has recently been started in Argentina at Rafaela, Province of Santa Fé. The school has been recognized by the provincial Government, and will issue diplomas. Entrance requirements are as follows: Students must be at least 16 years old, in good health, of good conduct, speak, write, and read Spanish, and understand arithmetic, mental computations, fractions, decimals, and elementary geometry. A two years' course is being offered.

Homesteaders settled upon more than 11,200,000 acres of Government land during the last fiscal year. Uncle Sam still has 279,500,000 acres left.

Steps are being taken in England toward the establishment of a permanent British Empire Fair representing all the industries and natural resources of the empire. Influential manufacturers are now arranging a combination, through their trade associations, to erect a building at Willesden Green to be called the Palace of Industry, which it is hoped to have ready for opening in the Spring of 1917. A site of about fifty acres has been chosen, and it is planned that the exhibition will occupy 500,000 square feet, and will be three times the size of the largest exhibition building at present in London. The object is to institute for the British Empire a fair equal in size and scope to the well-known Leipsic Fair. Being a co-operative movement among British firms there are to be no profits. A fixed charge is to be made for space, based as nearly as possible on the total expenses, and it is a condition that any profit accruing shall be returned to exhibitors in proportion to the area occupied by each.

Horsehair is used in Russia for making a great variety of articles. Brushes are made from it, the manes being kept for soft brushes. White horsehair is considered the most valuable for this purpose, and black the second best. The long hair of horses' tails is utilized for fishing tackle, violin bows, military headdress, and cloth for pressing oil. Shorter hair is used for stuffing mattresses and furniture, after having been cleaned with soap and water. The value of horsehair varies greatly, according to grade. On the Petrograd market one pood (36.11 pounds) of unprepared horsehair (gray manes) my be purchased at 6 to 8 rubles, ($8.50 to $11.40 per 100 pounds,) while long horsehair manes fetch a price of $107 per 100 pounds, and even more. The prices paid for Russian horsehair abroad are much higher.

The United States manufactured 703,527 motor cars last year, or 36 per cent. more than it made during the previous year. The value of these cars was $523,463,808.

Child Adoption an Exact Science Nowadays

When the Well-to-do Wish to Take Children to Rear as Their Own the Youngsters Go Through Tests Unknown to the Old Days of Mere Sentiment

A Lucky Adopted Child.

CHILD adoption is an exact science these days. The good, old way was to take "Orphant Annie" and "John Doe" on faith, but now they must do their Binet tests and be right as trivets.

The recent adoption of a bright, fair-haired boy by Mr. and Mrs. Finley J. Shepard, which implied that through Mrs. Shepard, who was Miss Helen M. Gould, he would inherit millions, has brought forth a flood of letters. Hundreds of parents want their children transplanted under such conditions, and scores of institutions have perfectly likable youngsters whom they would see with belated golden spoons.

There has been an ever-increasing demand in the last few months by wealthy or well-to-do families for sound, healthy children to be reared as sons and daughters of the house. Between the expression of the wish, however, and the arrival of the child in his new setting there is a long, hard road. The child must pass through ordeals unknown in the days when sentiment was the principal and often the only guide to choice.

Three millionaires not long ago gave directions to one of the representatives of the Children's Aid Society that they wanted children to bring up as their own. Two wished girls and one a boy. To carry out their instructions required the consideration of the merits of hundreds of children, and the choice was finally narrowed down to twenty candidates, none of whom would do. One of the applicants, who lives in Connecticut, after making frequent visits to institutions, was able to find a little girl who in temperament and appearance he considered suited to become a member of his household.

The accounts of adoption of young Austin McCleary, as he is supposed to be on the evidence of a name found sewed on his clothes when he was discovered on the steps of St. Patrick's Cathedral, tell of the frequent visits of Mr. and Mrs. Shepard to the home for orphans at Dobbs Ferry, from which he was chosen. Many children are said to have been considered before the fortunate one went to Lyndhurst.

Before any play of the affections is permitted, there are certain hard and practical questions for which the modern science of adoption demands answers.

In the first place, it must be definitely proved that the child is normal. When the taking of children was dictated entirely by sympathy or pity, it was no unusual thing to see the misshapen or half-witted child at the hearth of his foster parents. In these days that type stays in the institution. Those who adopt insist upon the best. Placing out agencies send their children to the clinics to be tested for tuberculosis and kindred ills. Before a child can be considered for adoption by a family of position his blood must be examined for traces of hereditary taint. If there is the slightest ground for suspicion he is rejected. Heart, lungs, and digestion must be strong and able. The back must be straight; the legs well turned and regular; the features good.

I have before me a blank of the State Charities Aid which annually finds homes for hundreds of babies. This examination paper of the candidate for a good home somewhere, not one where there is luxury, has spaces in which it may be noted whether the child has had the customary diseases. It requires details as to swollen joints, inflamed glands, bow legs, and half a score of other particulars. The condition of ears, eyes, nose, throat, neck, and chest must be accurately set forth. Youngsters with pigeon squab breasts and funnel ones, or prominent ribs and flat chests, need not apply. How is the gait of the candidate? Is it well balanced, or shambling? Is he pigeon-toed, or are his feet everted? Kindly state, also, the "anatomical stigmata" of John Doe. We must know if he has an asymmetrical cranium, or a symmetrical face. Is the forehead low or high? Are his ears well placed? Is he cross-eyed? Are the teeth regular, or perchance are they irregularly set? Are the fingers long or short? Any altered special senses? Has the candidate ability to withstand nervous strain? Touching now the matter of psychic stigmata, has little Jane Roe any exaggerated egotism, any excessive self-consciousness, any ill-balanced mental activity?

Simon-Binet tests are usually applied, being adapted to the years of the child. What does John Doe know about himself? He is asked as to his age and sex, just to test his general intelligence. And Jane, which is your right hand? What is the day of the week, and how much is a yard?

So much for the beginning. These are kind of elimination tests. A person of wealth who has found several children who please him and finally selects one for final consideration has some well-known specialists on children's diseases make an exhaustive examination. Up-to-date laboratory tests are employed. If the candidate now passes muster, there are many elements to be considered before he is enabled to enter the gates of well-tried adoption.

When the preliminary tests are over, the question uppermost in the minds of those who would adopt a child is "How will he respond to his new environment?" After the child grows up will he or she seem to be their very own? Is the child of gentle birth? Does he seem as though to the manner born? If he is of sound body and sound mind, if he has good memory, good sight and perfect hearing, if he be quick-witted and observing, that question does not bother the new parents much. If the hands and feet are not abnormally large and there are no signs of excessively plebeian origin there is a good margin on which to take a chance. Adaptability is possessed by most normal children. This is shown in the case of the new master of Lyndhurst. He seems to have settled into his new life as though he had always known it.

The experts who aid wealthy families in finding children are quick to note the signs of response. They can tell almost by instinct as to whether or not the child will blend with new settings. Scores of the great men of all ages have sprung from the so-called masses. So there are hundreds of children in the homes of foster parents all over the United States who were originally foundlings or first saw the light in the tenement, who have speedily formed themselves to their new lives. The experts look for the signs of quick imitation. The average intelligent child has that faculty well developed, and by it he is ennabled to adapt himself to the new surroundings. One of the remarkable features of this phase of the matter is that foundlings will so imitate strangers who adopt them that there often develops a resemblance in appearance and even in mental traits.

There is an especial demand at the present time for children from 3 to 4 years of age. This age is preferred because the child is not likely to retain any memory of his real parents if he has come in contact with them, nor would he have much of a recollection even of the orphan asylum in which he was reared. This is the preferred age for adoption also because then if the child has objectionable traits or hereditary taint that tendency may be discerned even by the lay observer. Disposition is detected by insight. By talking with the child, after science has done its appointed task, the man or woman who contemplates adopting one can, if he is at all keen, determine what its nature is and, what is more important, what it is likely to be. There is everywhere the quest for the child of sunny disposition. If a youngster is a born optimist, as John Doe No. 104 seems to be, that will show itself in many ways. The happy smile is often as important as anything else. A child that prattles, asks questions, and climbs about and finds fun in everything, is the kind that people of all classes like to have. If such a child should find his way to a home where money will provide every advantage, he develops into a carefree young chap, ready to ride to hounds and to take his chances on breaking his collarbone at polo. The signs of good nature, of life, of initiative are eagerly sought by both the amateur and the professional seekers after adoptable children.

Before and After Adoption.

The demand at this time is for two boys to every girl. Boys clamber about more, they give the idea of action. There is something stimulating in their presence. Hence they are asked for by persons who have plenty of room in the country.

One of the favorite methods of adopting children is to select a boy or girl from a group and then have the candidate placed in the care of a family that cares for children of this class, so that the development of the nature of the child may be watched to a certain point.

The last step preceding adoption is the long quest by persons of wealth for the story of the family history or an exact story of parentage. Extraordinary care was taken in the case of the child adopted by Mr. and Mrs. Shepard on account of the important matters of inheritance which might grow out of the formal adoption. The quest through many cities for traces of the boy's origin is not an unusual feature of adoptions. Before the new parents get their hearts set upon the child they want to have some reasonable assurance that there is no likelihood of blackmail from designing relatives or any prospect of the appearance of undesirable connections.

The number of adoptions like that which is most recently before the public mind is much greater than is ordinarily supposed. It is an economic law that those who are surrounded by wealth and power frequently do not reproduce themselves as much as do those who are less fortunate in life. The increasing number of late marriages, not only among the rich, but among persons who are of moderate means, has decreased the birth rate among what might be called the native American stock. The immigrants have large families and so the birth rate in the United States is maintained.

Democracy seems to assert itself continuously through these adoptions, and the hardy and eugenic youngsters from a lower social strata make their way upward.

In the course of a few years the trace of their humbler origin is obliterated and they are found adapting themselves to the new surroundings in a free and joyous life. It is said that Miss Clara B. Spence, the head of a fashionable school for girls, and her associate, Miss Baker, within the last two or three years have had a hundred foundlings and orphans adopted by well-known families of this and other cities.

One of the best-known cases in sociological annals is the adoption of a waif known as Katherine Kennedy by a Wall Street broker and his wife. The child bears their name and regards them as her father and mother. She was chosen from a great many and responded to all the eugenic tests, and above all had that happy nature and the pleasing grace which so readily attract all who would adopt children.

The most conspicuous successes in adoption which have been made by institutions like the Children's Aid Society were through taking boys from the city slums to the pure air of the country. Thousands of them have been sent West in this way during the last sixty years. Now comes a new dispensation which brings the selected orphan child of good physique and well-balanced mind into families where all is provided that makes for living under the best conditions.

This is often called the Age of the Child. There has been all over the country an awakening interest in the younger generation, as is shown by the growth of child welfare associations, of milk stations, and of the many societies devoted to reducing infant mortality. There has been a tremendous access of enthusiasm in the education of children.

Spending $12,000,000 to Save Three Miles

W. H. Truesdale, Railroad President, Expounds Modern Theories of Economics and Tells Why This Is the World's Luckiest Nation

By Edward Marshall.

DURING the week one of the most notable engineering achievements of the world will be put into the actual service of fetching and carrying for New York, when the Lackawanna Railroad for the first time will send regular passenger trains over the new "cut-off" which the road has built between Clark's Summit and Hallstead, Penn.

Twelve million dollars have been expended on the work. It is 39.6 miles long.

Those figures should be fixed in memory before the next is quoted. They will serve to startle the lay mind with sudden appreciation of one of the vital theories of modern business, the fact that, in the East—this section of it, anyway—we are approaching, in this new country, regardless of expense, a completeness of organization which enables us to turn from big things in the mass to details. We are, so to speak, becoming finished.

These thirty-nine-odd miles of railway construction and this expenditure of $12,000,000 will save, for freight and passengers, 3.6 miles between New York and Buffalo!

Twelve million dollars for 3.6 miles!

The other day I had a talk with William Haynes Truesdale, President of the road.

"This enterprise," said he, "is typical of modern business. It means increased efficiency, and that alone. It opens no new territory. We in the United States are beginning to arrive at that stage of development which demands attention to and investment in perfected details.

"In a general way the nation has been 'covered' by its transportation lines. The time has come when they must be brought to perfection.

"The first problem, that of distance, has been solved; the second problem, that of speed, is progressing along its natural line of evolution; now we must give time and thought to the third problem, that of efficiency, and attention to this detail shows that what may sometimes seem like extravagance of construction very well may be, in the truest sense, economy of operation.

"We of the Lackawanna are proud of the completed job which will begin to bear its fruit this week; but it is typical of work which is being done by others in this country every day, although, certainly, usually on smaller scales.

"We of the Lackawanna, like other American railway managements, are anxious to provide a transportation machine of the highest possible efficiency. If we do this we must not be afraid to do rebuilding. Rebuilding sometimes represent as much true enterprise as original constructora.

"This cut-off, between Clark's Summit and Hallstead, Penn., is substituted for 43.2 miles of almost the first stretch of road built in the section. Sixty-four years ago the best engineers of those days opened about fifty miles of line between Scranton and Hallstead, calling it the Liggett's Gap Railroad.

"It followed the best route they could find for their purposes. It was an achievement—one of the many little pioneer railways which were the beginning of the superb network of railways which now crisscrosses the nation from one coast to the other. Its builders built as best they could. Theirs was one of probably two dozen small roads later absorbed into the Lackawanna system.

"The object of transportation lines in those days was to furnish some sort of transportation between place and place. The object of transportation lines today is to furnish the best sort of transportation between place and place. If we should give the patrons of the Lackawanna in this month of 1915 one trip over such a roadbed as these old-time engineers constructed with much travail, high pride, and, everything considered, very great ability, we would lose their patronage for all time to come.

"It is a rough country which the line traverses. Those fifty-odd miles of track are full of grades and curves.

"They were built when the United States was not the prosperous nation which it is today, when capital was difficult to get and before our engineers had had a chance to become minutely expert in regard to certain haulage problems.

"It must be remembered, too, that the locomotives and the trains of those days would seem like toys if we should place them on our tracks today.

"From time to time, as the years passed, the road was brought up to modern standards along these miles, but it was not a perfect modern railroad, and we felt that it must be, although there are not many such.

"Its traffic was increasingly heavy and its tracks, upon which this traffic needs must be hauled, were almost a continuous curve.

"The disadvantages of avoidable curves, no matter how carefully they may be built, are not to be denied. They add slightly to the dangers of railroading, they add somewhat to the discomforts of railroading, and they add immensely to the cost of haulage, for they not only increase distances, but they increase traction and wear and tear.

"It is harder to pull a train around a curve than it is to pull it on a straightaway, for obvious reasons, and for the same reasons—which may be classified under the general heading of side-pull, increasing friction and strain—the wear and tear upon a curved track is greater than that upon a straight track.

"Furthermore, these curves increased the cost of freight haulage by necessitating helper engines and decreasing the possible length and weight of trains. These few miles were a nuisance on a road of which we otherwise felt that we might be justly proud.

"We did not want to rebuild almost forty miles of road, and made various studies which we hoped might develop some other practical method, considering even the virtual abandonment of the present line; but it finally became apparent that the method we have followed would be best. We reconciled ourselves, therefore, to the great expenditure involved.

"We were confronted by such a situation as must come, sooner or later, to every railroad built under pioneer circumstances through a new country, which, largely because of its help, gradually becomes developed country.

"We decided that we had better not take a small view of the situation, and I finally recommended the adoption of that one of our engineers' plans which suggested the new cut-off.

"There were other savings than the shortening of distance to be considered. The new route will give us a maximum grade of .68 per cent., against a previous maximum grade of 1.23 per cent., and a total curvature of 1560 degrees, against a total curvature of 3970 degrees.

"These, to the layman, may seem all small and unimportant results—as the slight saving in mileage may seem. But, together, these changes will cut the running time of every passenger train between New York and Buffalo by twenty minutes, and will reduce the running time of freights by a full hour. Nor is this all. By reducing the traction, through reducing the grade, they will make it possible to move trains with two engines which, under present conditions, require five.

"That is modern business. Especially it is modern railroading.

"Now let us consider some of the details of the undertaking. One makes it worthy of that keen attention which the American always is ready to give to the maximum of mechanical performance.

"The Tunkhannock Viaduct is 240 feet high, more than a hundred feet higher than the roadway of the Brooklyn Bridge, and is half a mile long. It is by several times the largest concrete bridge in the world, with ten spans of 180 feet each and two spans of 100 feet each.

"It contains approximately 4,500,000 cubic feet of concrete and 2,280,000 pounds of reinforcing steel, the trains which cross it being guarded between massive parapet walls rising four feet above the level of the track and three feet thick. Each of its foundations has been carried down to the bed rock, and this, in the case of two of its piers, meant making excavations ninety-six feet deep.

"In a very rough and sketchy fashion that gives an idea of one of the many details of engineering and expenditure which it seemed wise to make in order to save the traveling public 3.6 miles between New York and Buffalo, and in order to save extravagant expenditure of power in haulage.

"Such things, or, at least, very important things in the way of improvement, are being done continually by American railroads.

"Of course we of this road are elated at the completion of this especial enterprise. To us personally it has the significance of a big job well done.

"To the public it has a far greater significance, for it means that this republic, by and of and for the people, still is constructing—building, building, always building—even in the East, where we already are more highly developed than most older countries.

"At this particular time this construction work, any large American construction work, should stir our patriotism and make us all resolve to help this nation progress steadily and undeviatingly along the lines laid down by those who founded it, for we alone, of all the world's really great nations, are at present doing any constructive work whatever.

"The balance of the really great nations are busy at destructive work. They are killing men more rapidly than they are giving babies birth and they are destroying rather than building or rebuilding. To me this cut-off has, as one of its inspiring meanings, that particular message for us all.

"Another point about it which pleases me and which ought to please the people of the East is that it is even more daring and original than any of the great railroad construction works in the mountain regions of our Western country, where novelists are fond of saying that our ingenuity and virility at present have their habitat and reach their zenith.

"This is a task of the effete East and is so notable that, long ago, several foreign Governments planned to send their representatives to see it and have been prevented from so doing only by the war.

"There it is again. Their best brains have been absorbed in warfare, in destruction, while our best brains have been absorbed in vast peaceful feats of construction.

"One of the problems which an American railway President is privileged to think of, even this year, is the improvement of his line. He is not compelled to contemplate its ruin by an posing armies, he is not obliged to consider traffic only in relation to the work of moving troops, supplies, and ammunition.

"The public, which is playfully prone to attack railroads as a pastime, forgets the enormous amount of thought and labor which are constantly devoted to keeping the bedeviled institutions up to the great task of serving it.

"Ceaselessly we must search for new ideas and, when we have found them, give them careful and intelligent consideration. We must continually study traction and improvements in rolling stock. Now and then we must find time for such improvements in the right-of-way as are represented by this cut-off.

"In these days all American railways especially are confronted by a problem newly vital, born of the growth in numbers and popularity of motor cars upon the country roads—the problem of grade crossings, for it seems that it has become the task of the railroads of this country to protect the intelligent against their own carelessness. Since the beginning we have been faced by the problem of preserving the unintelligent—the man and woman who would walk on the tracks despite all warning signs. This protection of the otherwise intelligent from this one foolishness is a new work thrust upon us. That was one of the important matters which was in our minds when we decided upon the form of construction finally adopted for the great New Jersey cut-off which we completed at a great expense some years ago. That eliminated only eleven miles, but it also eliminated grade crossings.

"The Long Island Railroad has found it wise to begin and to conduct at great expense a campaign of education among motorists, designed to make them careful of their own lives and property.

"Railroading is changing very rapidly and no prophet who is wise will venture a prediction as to what the next development will be.

"In 1900 the average number of tons carried in one of our freight trains was 325, this year it is 625.

"That seems to mean that we have been able to build stronger cars and engines of greater power to haul them. What it really and principally means is that we have been able to and have been compelled to build better roadbeds, embankments, and bridges to carry the added load.

"Indeed, the first improvement necessary to an increase of load must be in the roadbed. Car improvement can come later. Later still may be considered motive power, for even the present comparatively small power units may be doubled up to represent large aggregates.

"In 1900 our road carried 14,400,000 passengers 283,000,000 miles, and in 1914 we carried 24,700,000 passengers 530,508,000 miles—not only doubling the number of passengers but slightly increasing the mileage for each passenger.

"In the first period we ran passenger trains 5,423,000 miles, and in the second 6,230,000 miles.

"Our total freight receipts in the first period amounted to $15,135,100, and in the second period to $28,448,000, with freight train miles for the first period totaling 6,129,000, and for the second period 6,154,000 and the total number of freight cars engaged in traffic increasing from 27,287 to 28,241.

"A careful study of these figures will show an immense increase of efficiency. Note the fact that there were less than 1,000 more freight cars. Yet the total amount of freight transported was about doubled in this period.

"Improvements in rolling stock have been tremendous. The freight car of today has an increased capacity over that of 1900 of about 60 per cent. varying in different parts of the country in accordance with the different kinds of load carried.

"In coal regions, where great concentrated loads must be hauled, a very different rolling stock is required from that demanded in agricultural sections where grain is to be transported, or, for instance, in sections where a large part of the freight is made up, say, of flour.

"But the improvement all along the line has been extraordinary. Fifteen years ago an average box car would carry 40,000 pounds. Today the average box car will carry nearly 70,000 pounds. The capacity of open cars also has nearly doubled. Many of the older cars are still in use, but the standards are rising about as fast as possible.

"As we have increased the weight of the equipment and the weight of freight carried by it, we have been compelled to increase the weight of metal put into car wheels and to change the material from chilled iron to steel, and an obviously necessary result of the generally increased weight of rolling stock and load has been an increase of the weight of rails. Since 1900 this has advanced about 30 per cent.

"Nor is this all. General reconstruction of our road and equipment for handling heavier loads has made necessary the reconstruction of nearly every bridge upon the line.

"The improvements which have been made in the Lackawanna Road since I became its President have amounted, in cost, to twice its present capitalization. This, though extreme, in a measure is typical of other roads. There is an answer to some of the fashionable critics of the railways! There is no water in that money. Consider it. The money which we have put back into permanent improvements during fifteen years' time has amounted to twice the total capitalization of the road!

"The 'man on the street' has no conception of the problems which confront the managers of railways. We have had to rebuild every shop and plant upon the line within the last fifteen years in order that they might be competent to handle the new rolling stock. I think not one building stands today that stood fifteen years ago. All have been replaced by larger, stronger structures.

"The traction problem is enormous. Punctuality of service depends more upon the locomotive than upon anything else, and, owing to the peculiar conditions under which we operate, we have the most modern locomotive rebuilding and repairing shops in the world.

"We not only must take up wear and tear but we must meet new demands continually. All roads must do that or deteriorate. Equipment constantly must perform the maximum of service and the maximum of service constantly is increasing.

"It is difficult for a man on the inside of the railroad situation to always understand the viewpoint of the American upon the outside of that situation. Our railroads are handling transcontinental traffic now during the months of the fair as such traffic never has been handled before and at lower rates than ever it was handled equally well anywhere else on earth.

"Railroading is an American talent. It is being developed here more rapidly than ever it was developed anywhere else. Ninety-nine per cent. of America's male youngsters play with railway toys and prefer them, for a certain period, even to baseballs and bats, which are equally American devices.

"We are confronted by many new problems at this time. The European war, of course, has stimulated freight business throughout the country. Grain and other food products required in the countries at war have moved in larger volume than they would have moved if there had been no war, of course, for, mad with war, the fighting countries have had neither time nor men with which to produce their own food. Deprived of Russian and Southeastern European food, the fighting nations have been compelled to turn to us, and a bumper-crop year fortunately has given us food to send to them. In the meantime the munitions of war trade has given the railroads a large business in both raw and finished articles.

"But in passenger traffic since the war began there has been a loss of 7 per cent. The fastest trains have not been seriously affected, but it is not the fastest trains that run to the best profit.

"It is difficult to say offhand how large a proportion of the traveling public is moved on the fast trains. A Pullman car holds only thirty people, while the average day coach holds eighty. We are hopeful of the passenger traffic, for the travel to the fair has been very notable, and, coming in conjunction with the inhibition of European travel, it may result in a general 'see America first' impulse.

"America is worth seeing first. It is hard for me to understand why people should yearn to see Lake Geneva, in Switzerland, for instance, when they can much more easily see Lake Louise or Lake Tahoe. They are far more beautiful. I wonder how many of the Americans who read this article will know where they are if I do not mention their location.

"We of the Lackawanna consider ourselves fortunate. Our financial position is different from that of any other railway in the country. Ours is a compact system located in a section producing heavy traffic of all kinds, and our capitalization has been held low. The market value of the Lackawanna is about four times as great as its capitalization.

"The whole country is confronted by such an opportunity as never has existed in the past. It has built up various 'big businesses,' and these big businesses have begun to mean small expenditures in proportion to results. That must mean that through their influence the whole country is beginning to get away from that wastefulness which so long characterized everything we did.

"I fail to see any argument which can condemn business merely for being large, for great size always means efficiency in business. It doesn't matter how large an expenditure may be if it ultimately will result in economies of operation. That was the principle on which we worked in constructing the new cut-off.

Once the managers of big businesses were wasteful. The modern manager has a different ideal. He knows that he must not be afraid to make expenditures, no matter what their magnitude may be, if their ultimate result will be economies. But while he makes big expenditures with a gigantic courage, he watches small expenditures with minute care.

"Personally I believe that watchfulness of details is as necessary to the success of a big business as the imagination which in the first place has seen the vision that must be the basis of all really big business. Of course the man at the top has not the time to watch the details, but he can send the impulse down, so that others will. The sending of that impulse downward imparts the discipline which makes big business as well as armies successful.

"It was my good fortune, in my early days, to work, most of the time, upon railways which were only a stride or two in advance of the Sheriff. That was a great training. My first executive railroad experience was as receiver of the Minneapolis & St. Louis Railway, and I managed to set it on its feet. It was great fun and it was splendid training.

"It taught me another thing besides boldness in big essentials and caution in little necessaries—it taught me that in the management of a railroad or any other big institution there must be instilled into the organization a true sense of team work, which will eliminate envies and jealousies of every sort.

"I am always an optimist about this country, and am more so than ever this Autumn, after a trip out to the fair. But these are days for careful thinking.

"So far we have very greatly benefited by the European war, but when the people over there find out what their losses have been and what remains to them in men and money with which to carry on their necessary activities, it is impossible to say just what the effect on us will be.

"It is possible and even probable that Europe may for a period of years be unable to continue the vast developments of still undeveloped countries which have had their principal sources in her enterprises, and that we may have to take her place at that work. We may of necessity become world-developers and world-bankers.

"In view of this it is necessary that we should act with the utmost caution and intelligence. There are those of us who believe that in pursuing the economic course which we have been following we may fix our cost of production so high that it will make it impossible for us to compete with Europe after it has regained sanity and settled down to that desperate peace which must follow this desperate war.

"She will be grimly determined to retain her old markets and to make new ones.

"Just how much her losses of men will cripple her nobody can estimate at present.

"I never have thought that we, or any one, could get any benefit of a permanent nature from this war. I cannot see it in any other way than as a world disaster. I believe all wars to be wrong, and that no international question can arise which could not be and might not be much better settled peacefully.

"The world is getting to be a small place, because of improved communication, and what affects one nation now affects all nations to a very apparent extent. This makes war far more dangerous than it used to be, and makes the business of keeping everybody out of war not his own business or that of his neighbor, but the whole world's business."

German Princes Who Have Fallen in the War

Of Sixty-Four Scions of Princely Families of the Empire Who Went to the Front Nine Have Been Killed, Including a Nephew of the Kaiser

THOUGH the Kaiser and his six sons have so far escaped with their lives in the war, other great families of Germany have not been so fortunate. Out of a total of sixty-four of their members who marched to battle with their regiments, nine have been killed, among them a nephew of the Kaiser.

A book has just appeared in Germany dedicated to the memory of these nine Princes, giving, wherever possible, full details of how they met death. If the information is trustworthy, the Princes of Germany are excellent examples to their followers. Without exception those with whom the book deals seem to have been popular with their men—brave in the face of peril and careless of their own safety when it was thrown into the scale with that of their subordinates.

Of the nine, no less than four were relatives or connections of the princely family of Lippe, which still rules—though its powers are by no means what they were before the creation of the German Empire—over various bits of territory sandwiched in among the greater States of Central Germany. One of the others, Prince Henry of Reuss, was of that family whose members have the unique custom, if they are in the line of succession, of taking the name Henry and the numeral corresponding to it after all preceding Henrys have been counted. Thus, this Prince was Henry XLVI. of Reuss.

The Princes whose careers and deaths are recorded in the book dedicated to their memory are:

Maximilian of Hesse, son of a sister of the Kaiser; Friedrich Wilhelm zur Lippe; Friedrich of Saxe-Meiningen; Ernst of Saxe-Meiningen, his son; Ernst zur Lippe; Otto Victor of Schönburg-Waldenburg; Wilhelm zu Schönaich-Carolath; Wolrad zu Waldeck und Pyrmont, and Henry XLVI. of Reuss.

Prince Ernst of Lippe.

Prince Maximilian of Hesse, the Kaiser's nephew, was only 20 years old when he was killed in Northern France. He was a son of Prince Karl Friedrich of Hesse and Princess Margarete of Prussia, sister of Emperor William II. His father and older brother had already been wounded in the fighting on the western front. Details of the death of Prince Maximilian are lacking.

Prince Friedrich Wilhelm of Lippe was killed in the very first engagement of the war, the storming of Liége. He was a younger brother of Count Ernst zur Lippe-Biesterfeld, regent of the Lippe-Biesterfeld lands, and an uncle of their present ruler, Julius zur Lippe-Biesterfeld. Prince Friedrich was born in 1858 and became a color-bearer in one of the crack Prussian regiments in 1880. After successive promotions he received the rank of Colonel and in 1913 was placed at the head of the Seventy-fourth Hanover Infantry Regiment.

Just how he met his death is a matter of dispute. According to some of the evidence he fell just after he had snatched up the banner of his regiment and began to wave it before his men, to encourage them in storming the fortifications of Liége. This same account has it that he had already received a serious wound, but, utterly disregarding it, continued to lead his men, banner in hand, until he fell pierced by several more bullets.

The commander of another infantry regiment gave a somewhat different account of the Prince's end. A reliable eyewitness, he reported, had said that a detachment of Prince Friedrich Wilhelm's regiment, bearing one of the regimental banners, had fought its way to a position on the northeastern walls of the City of Liége on the morning of Aug. 6, 1914. There it was surrounded by greatly superior forces of Belgians, who attacked with great fury and threatened to overwhelm the detachment completely. The Prince commanded his men to form a hollow square. In this formation they defended themselves with the utmost determination. At last, far away to the left, German reinforcements were discerned. The Prince, in a kneeling position, placed a field glass to his eye and commanded one of his men—the same who gave this version of his last moments—to raise the regimental standard, so that the approaching Germans might see it plainly and be guided toward the spot where they were so badly needed.

The man obeyed. He waved the banner back and forth. This brought a hail of Belgian bullets. The banner was shot from its bearer's hands; at the same moment the Prince fell, shot in the breast and throat. He started to say something beginning with the words, "Take my greetings to—" but died before he could finish.

Kaiser Wilhelm sent a message of condolence on Prince Friedrich Wilhelm's death to the reigning Prince of Lippe, in which he said:

"I beg you to accept the expression of my sincerest sympathy on the occasion of the death of your worthy uncle, who, as a shining example of a brave German Prince, died at the head of his regiment at Liége for Emperor and empire."

The Prince's body was taken to his native land and buried beside his ancestors at Detmold.

Prince Friedrich of Saxe-Meiningen, the next German Prince to fall, was connected with the Lippe house by marriage, his widow being a sister of the reigning Prince of Lippe. He was a son of Prince Friedrich of Saxe-Meiningen, and was born Oct. 12, 1861. Unlike most scions of princely houses, he was studious, averse to display and social life. As a student at the University of Bonn, back in the eighties, he refused to have an adjutant or other followers, as was the custom with men of his rank, and refused even to keep a carriage and horses. His high lineage brought him membership in the "Borussia," most exclusive of the students' dueling corps, to which only noblemen can belong, but he attended its meetings but rarely, despite the fact that the present Emperor, at that time a Bonn student, was very prominent in "Borussia" gatherings.

The Prince got his "baptism of fire," or something like it, while at Bonn, when a retort exploded near him while he was making a chemical experiment.

As a Lieutenant at Strassburg, he continued to keep away from gayety and social life and devoted himself to hard study of the subject of artillery, which branch of the service he had entered after being made Colonel in 1902, Brigadier General in 1907, and Major General in 1910. He was retired at his request in 1913. Five months before his death he celebrated his silver wedding.

He went to the front when war began, although he had broken his arm a short time before in a fall. His 18-year-old son, Prince Ernst, doomed like his father to death, also joined his regiment.

For a time it was impossible for his relatives to learn details of Prince Friedrich's death, as men were falling by thousands on the western and eastern fronts, but at last another of his sons, Prince George, wrote thus to his mother from Brussels:

I have made a long excursion from here to France, and at Charlerol spoke with a priest who was present when father's body was embalmed.

In the evening I got to Laon, where I visited a friend, whose uncle commands the division in which father fought, and I also saw father's successor, the present commander of his brigade. Hipp (orderly of the dead Prince) was also at Laon, and I spoke to him, and also saw father's horses, Molly, Dora, and Carmen. Hipp has taken good care of the horses and is quite well himself. Others whom I saw were Captain Welts, father's Adjutant, who was with him up to the last minute, and another gentleman on father's staff, who has often spoken with Prince Friedrich of Saxe-Meiningen.

Count Meerfeldt, in whose arms father died.

According to their stories, father and Welts rode forward on Aug. 25 on a reconnaissance into the woods south of Charlerol. The enemy fired only a little and did not disturb them. But when our infantry came out of the woods a terrible firing began.

Father continued to reconnoitre in the midst of it without getting hit. As our infantry could get no further without artillery support, father himself went back to bring up a battery. Ignoring the enemy's fire, he rode up a slope to pick out a position for the guns, and allowed nobody to accompany him, as he did not wish to endanger them. He then led the battery in person to the chosen position, again came under sharp fire and again escaped unharmed.

While the artillery was firing, he resumed his post of observation by a house near the fringe of the woods, and climbed on an overturned wagon to see better. But the fire got too hot, so he went into the house.

Then he was struck. In spite of repeated warnings, he persisted in going outside the house, where Count Meerfeldt had already been struck. He tried to jump to one side, but crumpled up in the very act, and died instantly. The wounds seem to have come from machine gun bullets, but possibly he was hit by three shrapnel balls, all at the same time, just as I have been by two at once.

The soldiers put him immediately on a stretcher. * * * On the morning before he died he wrote to you. One of the staff officers recalled that father asked him whether he had written to his wife, adding that he himself had done so.

Hipp, the Prince's orderly, also wrote a letter to his master's widow, in which he said:

"Your Highness may imagine how I feel. At first it seemed as if he could not possibly be dead. But one has to get accustomed little by little."

In the dead man's pocket a letter addressed to his wife was found, with a streak of blood across it. And in his pocketbook was her picture, also drenched with his blood.

His body was taken to Germany and buried in the town cemetery at Meiningen.

His son, Prince Ernst of Saxe-Meiningen, lay dead in Northern France, unbeknown to his relatives at home, while the bells of Meiningen were tolling for his father. The news had come that he was wounded and a prisoner at Maubeuge, then still in French hands. That was all.

When the Germans captured Maubeuge, investigations conducted by German officers proved that Prince Ernst had died of his wounds, and it fell to the Kaiser to communicate the news to the young man's sister at Meiningen, who in turn broke it to his mother, already mourning her husband and uncle.

Prince Ernst had a presentiment that he would never see his home again. Just before his departure he collected a number of keepsakes, asked his mother to distribute them among his best friends, and said to her:

"I shall never return."

Wounded comrades who did return described the boy's death. He was on patrol duty north of Maubeuge. The enemy made a sudden sortie; the Prince's horse was shot under him. Close beside him lay a non-commissioned officer, pinned under his horse and wounded. The Prince scrambled to his side and helped the man to his feet.

As he did it a bullet struck him in the head. Men rushed to help him. He motioned them away.

"We must not be taken," he said; "that would be terrible." Then he lost consciousness. In a few moments the French rushed up and overpowered the Prince's comrades. They took him into Maubeuge to the hospital, where he died the next day without having recovered consciousness.

Another comrade told how the French soldiers took the buttons from the uniforms of those captured with the Prince, as they were the first Germans to be taken, but respectfully refrained from touching those of the latter. This same man declared that the conduct of the French in Maubeuge had been most chivalrous. They did all in their power for Prince Ernst, and spoke in high terms of the courage and calm he had shown in the engagement. And they buried him with military honors.

Prince Ernst zur Lippe, fourth of the Lippe family to fall in the war, lost his life near St. Quentin late in August, 1914. He, too, was young, like Prince Ernst, having been born in 1892.

He was killed by the explosion of an ammunition wagon beside which he was standing. Projectiles struck him in the back, causing instant death. He was carried to the rear, where a Captain closed his eyes. Next morning he was buried close to where he fell.

Later his body was exhumed and buried in a strip of woods near Detmold, the principal town of the Lippe lands, lying opposite the great monument erected to the German national hero Hermann, who destroyed the Roman legions in the battle of the Teutoburg Forest. Of him also the Kaiser wrote in terms of high praise in a telegram of condolence to the ruler of Lippe.

Prince Otto of Schönburg-Waldenburg, of a family exercising lordship over territory in Saxony, was killed fighting in the neighborhood of Rheims soon after his thirty-third birthday. He was a Lieutenant in the Potsdam Guard Hussars, in which his father, who preceded him as Prince of Schönberg-Waldenburg, had served fourteen years. In memory of his father the young Prince gave a fund of 20,000 marks, ($5,000,) the income of which is turned over to deserving non-commissioned officers of the regiment and their families. On coming of age, in 1903, he gave other large sums for charitable purposes.

Prince Otto served at the beginning of the war on the eastern front. He was then transferred to France, and ten days after joining his regiment he took part in his last fight.

He met death, like so many other officers, while making a reconnaissance to determine the enemy's position. Accompanied by a small detachment, he was riding toward a railway embankment, when some French infantrymen hidden behind it suddenly opened fire on the party. One of the first bullets struck the Prince, who fell from his horse. His men hurried to his side, intent on giving him first aid, but he called out to them not to bother about him, but to report at once to headquarters the presence of the hostile troops and not to come back for him until they had done it.

They obeyed, made their report, and one hour later returned to where the Prince had fallen, accompanied by a doctor. But the Prince was dead. The doctor said that he must have breathed his last within a few minutes after being hit. The bullet had entered a little below his heart.

During a lull in the fighting he was buried by his comrades under a rosebush, the entire corps of officers of the Hussar regiment forming the funeral cortege. Later his body was exhumed and taken to Lichtenstein, where it was again buried with full military honors. On this occasion it was borne to the place of sepulture by wounded soldiers convalescing in Germany. They carried ahead of the coffin the simple wooden cross which had marked the Prince's burial place in France.

Prince Wilhelm zu Schönaich-Carolath, a Lieutenant in a regiment of Uhlans, was killed in Belgium a few days before his thirty-fourth birthday. Having ridden ahead of his regiment to ascertain whether the village of Meysse was occupied by the enemy, he fell into a regular hornets' nest. His men drew rein, wheeled their horses, and made off without noticing that their leader had fallen wounded to the ground.

When they missed him, a number of them galloped back, only to learn that the village was in the possession of English and French troops. This gave an opportunity to one of the Prince's men, a Uhlan called Jacob, to prove himself a man of splendid nerve. Though he knew that Meysse was held by the foe, Jacob crept into the village, entered a house on which a Red Cross flag was flying, and found the Prince, severely wounded. Recognizing the brave soldier, the Prince exclaimed: "Well, well, there's one of the Second Squadron Uhlans."

Then he swooned. In spite of the danger, Jacob stood around while a doctor did what he could for the wounded man.

"Are you being well cared for?" he asked the Prince. "My commander wishes to be sure of it." The Prince said that his wound was not serious. Then he gave his pistol to the brave soldier. "Keep it for yourself," he said. He tried to say more, but was too weak.

"You'd better get out of here," the doctor advised Jacob. "The enemy's all around." Seeing he could do nothing for the wounded man, the Uhlan crept back to the German lines and reported on what he had seen. He got the iron cross.

Soon the Germans drove the enemy out of Meysse and set about finding Prince Wilhelm. The doctor said that he had been transferred to Brussels. There they learned that he had died the night before, soon after reaching the hospital.

The news of the death of Prince Wolrad Friedrich zu Waldeck und Pyrmont reached Waldeck, his ancestral domain, on Oct. 18 of last year, just as the people were eagerly awaiting news of some victory that might serve to lend lustre to the celebration of the aniversary of the battle of Leipsic on that day. Instead of any such news his family received a telegram reading: "Prince Wolrad killed Oct. 17 at Moorslede, while leading a patrol."

He was born in 1892 and from early childhood showed signs of a determined and original cast of mind. Once he was told that he must take off his hat when people saluted him. "Why?" he objected. "Brother Fritz keeps his soldier's helmet on, doesn't he?" His family wanted to make a lawyer of him, but his heart was set on being either a sailor or a soldier.

After studying in Germany, he spent some time at Oxford in the Summer of 1910, and then attended the University of Grenoble in France. After spending some time as a student at Heidelberg and Halle, the family decided that it was no use to try to keep the Prince from his bent, so he became a soldier. In his new profession he showed far more proficiency than as a college student, and was soon made a Lieutenant in one of the Hessian dragoon regiments.

He fought in the Vosges, on the Meuse, in the battle of the Marne. His letters home told vividly of terrible scenes. Once, he narrated, some Frenchmen held up their hands in token of surrender and then fired on the Germans approaching to capture them. The Prince's revolver was shot out of his hand; several of his comrades fell.

"After that all the Frenchmen were killed, whether wounded or not," he wrote grimly. "Prisoners were not taken and have not been taken since."

Two of his horses were shot under him in the course of the fighting in France before he himself was killed, and a third when he, too, gave up his life. This was in a fight at Moorslede, near Lille. He was trying to aid a wounded dragoon of his command when a bullet killed him instantly. His orderly wrote:

"He looked after his men as if they were his own people. He was much beloved among us. You cannot imagine how badly the dragoons felt when his highness was killed. He was the best officer in the regiment. He went out on more patrol rides than any other officer, because he could find the roads better than the rest. Every one wanted to go patrol riding with him."

Prince Wolrad was something of a poet and wrote a number of verses by no means martial in character, with titles like "The Silence of the Forest," and "Homesickness." His body was taken back to Germany and buried with impressive ceremonies on the Hagen Mountain in his native domain.

Prince Henry XLVI. of Reuss was only 19 years old when he fell. He left school to go to the front, and was made a Lieutenant in a Hessian regiment.

His one wish was to win the Iron Cross. It was never fulfilled. In an attack on English trenches near La Bassée he was struck by shrapnel fragments and killed on the spot.

His soldiers apparently were quite attached to him. One private, a much older man, was always called "father" by the boy. An old railroad flagman at a railroad crossing in Marburg, where the Prince used to live, said that every one in the neighborhood liked him. "He never passed without stopping to chat with us," said the old fellow.

Ingenious War Swindlers at Work in England

ENGLISH swindlers are using the war as a cloak for various new methods for obtaining dishonest pounds, shillings, and pence. Even the Victoria Cross—that decoration "For Valour" which Britishers the world over revere as the highest possible of all recognitions of splendid deeds in battle—has not been sacred to those whose business is the getting of something for nothing.

Recently a man with a corporal's chevrons was taken around London by a recruiting officer, upon whom he had imposed in some way not made public, the man being introduced to street crowds as Corporal So-and-So, winner of the Victoria Cross at Ypres. Corporal So-and-So then made speech after speech to the crowds at street corners and in squares, telling of his own and his companions' deeds of heroism, describing the life at the front, and making stirring appeals for volunteers. So well did he play his part, and such pathos did he contrive to get into his talk about himself, that crowd after crowd passed the hat for him. At the end of the day he parted from the recruiting officer with bulging pockets, promising to return next day to carry on the work. But he never showed up, and the recruiting officer discovered overnight that the man was an impostor, who had never smelled powder, unless in a fight of toughs.

The ancient Spanish prisoner fraud—known to this country as well as to England—has come to the fore again, changing his nationality to Belgian. In antebellum days the swindler used to write letters stating that he was a Spanish officer who had hidden the war chest of the Carlist revolutionaries in a lonely spot in the mountains, that he was dying in prison, and wanted the addressee of the letter to accept half the money in consideration of the coming guardian to his daughter, the dupe in the meantime advancing certain funds for expenses.

But now the Spanish officer has become a Belgian, who, after the death of his master at Liége, fled to Spain with a fortune in English banknotes. He fears, he says, to attempt to pass the notes in Spain, and wishes the dupe to finance him so that he may bring the money to England, where a division will take place.

Many forged letters are coming to friends and relatives of British soldiers who have disappeared, stating that the writer is a prisoner in Germany and asking that funds be forwarded at once. The British Foreign Office officials believe these letters—which have now been stopped—to be the work of some renegade Englishman or a German who has lived long in England.

North and South Unite in New Organization

Membership of the United Military Order of America to be Made Up of Sons and Descendants of Men Who Wore Either the Blue or the Gray

FIFTY years have passed since Lee surrendered his Southern veterans to Grant at Appomattox. Thousands of the men who fought for the Union, or for the Confederacy, are still living, and there are hundreds of thousands of others who, too young themselves to bear arms, were yet old enough to realize what the terrible tragedy meant.

Twenty years ago the bitterness engendered by the civil war was still evident in every walk of American life. But in the last decade practically all of this bitterness has passed away. The veterans who fought under Grant, Sherman, and Meade and those who followed Lee, Jackson, and Stuart, have in that period met as brothers on the once bloody but now peaceful battleground of Gettysburg. Confederate veterans have journeyed into the very heart of abolitionist Boston, and been met and entertained by the men who once fought them. The same has happened in the South. To Richmond and other Southern cities the survivors of civil war campaigns have gone and smoked the pipe of peace with the men who once wore the gray.

Out of all this fraternity has arisen the organization to be known as the United Military Order of America, the membership of which is limited to the sons and descendants of men who wore the blue, of men who wore the gray, or of men who served the North or the South in official or other administrative capacities in the period between April 12, 1861, and April 9, 1865.

For many months past a body of patriotic Americans, of families that played their part and played it well in the civil war, have been at work perfecting the plan of the organization. These men, after many informal meetings and consultations, met at the Army and Navy Club in this city on Sept. 6 last, and then and there the United Military Order of America came into existence. Last Thursday the order was incorporated at Albany, and within the next few days the incorporators will meet and map out the definite and final plan for the extension of the order to all parts of the United States and its overseas possessions.

Prominent among the organizers of the order is Colonel Henry H. Andrew, a son of John A. Andrew, the famous war Governor of Massachusetts. Colonel Andrew first conceived the idea of an organization that would "unite in bonds of fraternity and friendship" the descendants of the men of the army, navy, and civilian services of the Union and of the Confederacy. He mentioned his idea to many of his friends whose fathers or grandfathers had fought on battlefields of the civil war. The response was instantaneous; they were all for it heart and soul.

The names of the incorporators indicate the true non-sectional character of the organization. They include a descendant of Abraham Lincoln, the sons of half a dozen war Governors of both Northern and Southern States, a Lee of the South, a Sherman, and a score of other men whose forebears risked their all that the Union might live, or the South might be independent. Besides Colonel Andrew, the incorporators are Edward C. Smith, President of the Central Railroad of Vermont and the Sherman National Bank of New York, a son of John Gregory Smith, war Governor of Vermont.

Henry A. Wise, grandson of the famous war Governor of Virginia, and former United States District Attorney for the Southern District of New York.

George Gordon Battle, formerly of North Carolina, son of a Confederate veteran, now a well-known lawyer in New York.

Dr. W. Seward Webb, son of General Webb of the Union Army, and a member of one of New England's oldest families.

The Rev. Dr. Alexander Hamliton, D. D.

Colonel John L. G. Lee of Maryland, whose father, a Colonel of the Confederacy, served on the staff of Fitzhugh Lee.

Samuel G. Bradford, son of Maryland's war Governor.

William A. Berry of New Hampshire, whose father was the war Governor of that State.

Colonel Hannibal E. Hamlin of Maine, son of Hannibal Hamlin, Vice President of the United States during the first Administration of Abraham Lincoln.

Louis Sanders, grandson of Commissioner Sanders, one of the Confederacy's envoys to Europe.

John L. Sheppard of Texas, son of a Confederate veteran and brother of the junior United States Senator from Texas.

The Rev. Dr. Charles L. Goodell of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

William Colgate Colby, whose father was a Union Adjutant General.

Poultney Bigelow, son of the American Ambassador to France during the civil war, the late John Bigelow.

Lincoln Isham, great-grandson of Abraham Lincoln.

The Rev. Dr. Fisher Howe Booth of New Jersey.

Reginald P. Sherman of the famous family of that name.

The Rev. Dr. Joseph Gilmore of Syracuse University, whose father was also a war-time Governor of New Hampshire.

Captain Frank D. Whitehead, not only a descendant of a Confederate veteran, but a Confederate veteran himself.

Captain Cassily Cook of the United Spanish War Veterans and a son of a Union soldier.

The object and membership rules of the new order are thus set forth in its constitution:

ARTICLE II.

OBJECTS.

1. To unite in bonds of fraternity and friendship the descendants of men in the army, navy, and civilian service of the North and South during the war between the States.

2. To make this order a permanent factor in stimulating legislation for maintenance of an adequate army, navy, and militia for National and State defense.

ARTICLE III.

MEMBERSHIP.

Section 1. Any acceptable man, 21 years of age, shall be eligible to membership in this order who is an hereditary member or eligible to hereditary membership in a recognized Northern or Southern patriotic organization of the United States of America in existence at date of formation of this order, in which qualification for membership is based on military, naval, or civilian service rendered between April 12, 1861, and April 9, 1865.

Any acceptable man, 21 years of age, shall also be eligible to membership in this order who is descended from an official of either the North or South, specified as eligible to membership in a recognized patriotic organization of the United States of America in existence at date of formation of this order, in which qualification for membership is based on services rendered between April 12, 1861, and April 9, 1865.

Colonel Henry H. Andrew.

No man will be able to get into the order under false pretenses. Every precaution to make that impossible has been taken. When an application is filed the applicant must give in detail the line of descent from the ancestor or ancestors whose service to one or the other side in the civil war renders him eligible for membership. That application must be passed upon not by one or two but by the entire membership of the National Executive Committee of the order, and not until the statements made in the application are investigated and proved true beyond all doubt will the application be forwarded to the Registrar General and the name of the applicant entered upon the rolls.

"We do not want any fakers in this organization, and, what's more, we are not going to have any," said Colonel Andrew to a TIMES reporter a few nights ago.

"If after enrollment, at any time, it shall be found that a misstatement has been made in an application that has been approved, the member who owes his membership in whole or in part to that misstatement will be automatically dropped from the rolls of the order.

"There are thousands of men, the very best in our American life, who are eligible to membership in the order, and we hope to get a great majority of them. We should like to get every one of them. Already, from all parts of the Union, we are hearing from men prominent in various walks of life who are eligible for membership, in which they approve heart and soul the spirit that is behind the movement.

"The society is and always will continue to be American to the core. A man can't be 'hyphenated' and also be a member of the United Military Order of America. If he comes in he must be for America first, last, and all the time, and, if he is not, he had better get out, or else he will be shoved out.

"The society was formed for the one great purpose, as stated in its constitution, of binding together in fraternity and love and loyalty to the United States the descendants of men who proved their Americanism—and I have in mind the Gray as well as the Blue—in the years between 1861 and 1865. We want to and we expect to unite the descendants of the men of the civil war in sentiment and to wipe out forever any sectional feeling that may still exist in our country.

"Right here I want to tell you that President Wilson coined the sentence that is to be the official motto of the order. That motto is his now famous expression: 'America First.'

"The order expects to do its part, in a wise, conservative, and sane way toward furthering the movement for adequate preparedness in the United States. Whatever it does, however, will be truly non-sectional and non-partisan, and its appeal will be to Americans, no matter what their political affiliations may be.

"The Military Order of America will never enter partisan politics. It could not do that and live to be the organization we expect it to be. We want Democrats and Republicans and Progressives and Populists and Prohibitionists and all other men who are eligible to membership under the constitution and whose Americanism is unquestioned."

The head of the national order will be known as the Governor General, and the office will be held alternately by men of Northern and Southern descent. There will be six Lieutenant Governor Generals, twelve Counselors General, one Treasurer General, one Registrar General, one Surgeon General, one Chaplain General, one Historian General, and a Board of Directors to be known as the National Commandery, the Chairman ex officio of which will be the Governor General. Among those whose names have been mentioned for Surgeon General is Dr. Bolling Lee of this city, a grandson of the Confederate Commander in Chief.

The seal of the order is a shield two and a half inches in diameter, the right side displaying thirteen diagonal stripes and the left three diagonal stripes. The crest is an American eagle head with open bill. The motto on the shield is "America First" and the arms are encircled by a ribbon bearing the name of the order and the date "1915." The stripes are alternately red and white; the motto is on a ribbon of blue. The crest is of gold on a cushion of red, white and blue.

The button of the order, to be worn in the buttonhole of the lapel of the coat, is a metal reproduction of the crest of the order.

War Has Taken 500,000 Horses from U. S.

Warning Conveyed in This Will Be Forced Home by the Coming Horse Show, Which Will Emphasize the Importance of Good Stock for Army Use

By Alfred B. Maclay,
Chairman Executive Committee National Horse Show Association.

IT is a far cry from Madison Square Garden to the war zone, yet there is sympathetic connection between these divergent scenes of activity in that the former has, for several years, served as a parade ground for the numerous army officers and horses now involved in the most titanic struggle of the ages.

In our National Horse Show representatives of Europe's smartest military organizations have met in friendly rivalry on many occasions. We remember them as good fellows all—charming units reflecting Old World courtesy and achievement of the highest order in open competition. There cannot be a doubt that their participation in our shows afforded inspiration, the good effect of which will be felt in all that pertains to our military contests for many years to come.

While the foreign contingent will not be with us this year, the classification will, if anything, be more interesting than ever, as all the spectacular and thrilling events have been retained and arrangements made for an imposing array of United States cavalry in special and open classes.

Particularly attractive will be the event known as the United States trooper class, which has been included as a result of co-operation between The Jockey Club and the National Horse Show Association for the purpose of encouraging the breeding of army horses. This competition will be open to all long-tailed saddle horses and hunters in the show, 15.2 to 16 hands high, 4 years old and over, and suitable to carry a cavalryman and his equipment to total 250 pounds. The prize will be in plate presented by The Jockey Club, and there will be a subscription fee of $5 for each entry. Besides the plate, the winner will take 50 per cent. of the subscribed money, while the second and third ribbon winners will take 30 and 20 per cent.

The European war has taken something like 500,000 horses and mules out of this country during the last year, and it is predicted that double that number will follow if hostilities continue for two more seasons. This unusual demand will by no means exhaust our supply of the grade of equine material called for. Much of it can easily be spared, as foreign buyers are gathering up sturdy chunks as "gunners" and picking somewhat better grades with longer necks and fairly good riding shoulders as cavalry mounts. The time is ripe, however, to retain our best and to conserve the foundation stock that can be depended upon to reproduce useful army horses adapted to our own needs.

Our National Horse Show must be credited with having anticipated the importance of cavalry horses, as years ago the organization took the initial step toward molding public opinion as to the relative efficiency of army mounts, and by arranging for an attractive display of American and foreign material added much to the flame of enthusiasm on the subject. The lessons presented in our classes have been supplemented by comparisons conducted under conditions involving competitive trials at long distances, as regular army service entails.

Exhibitors have, however, as a rule, made the mistake of presenting horses too light in build and too high in the leg. In the West, breeders and collectors long discovered this error, and they now look for short-legged horses with deep bodies. Under no circumstances will they pick a leggy horse, 16.1, to carry weight and show proof of unusual endurance. Personally, I think that 15.2 to 15.3 is the ideal height for a cavalry mount.

Squadron A, in the original organization with which I was associated, has shown some very useful horses, well adapted for army purposes, both as officers' chargers and troopers'. As a rule, utility has been the first consideration, and in open competition, when due credit has been accorded this characteristic, the horses have acquitted themselves well before critical judges.

I have kept in close touch with the progress made, and only considered horses of distinctly useful character when, some years ago, I was requested to draft the conditions of the class for militia mounts at Madison Square Garden.

This class calls for stallions, mares, or geldings, 15 to 16 hands, undocked; to be ridden by members of militia in any State in dress uniform without sidearms, saddles to be of hunting type; the horses to be practically sound; to be shown at walk, trot, canter, and gallop, turn on the forehand, change lead at canter, passage, break readily, stand while being mounted and take a brush fence three feet high; the horses to have been owned at least six months by a member or organization of the militia before the closing of entries, and to have been used regularly in drills certified to by commanding officers of organizations.

An exceedingly attractive class, which has, since its inception, been very popular, is that in which the Beresford Challenge Cup, presented by Colonel Lord Decies, is competed for by officers of the United States Army, the cup to be won twice by the same officer before it becomes his property. The spectacular event, rich in thrilling incidents, is the broad water jump, for the cup presented by Robert A. Fairbairn.

The Canadian Challenge Cup, presented by Sir Adam Beck, has founded a class always one of the most brilliant in the show, the trophy, in this instance, being held by the regiment to which the winning officer belongs.

Two very interesting classes, open to all nations and all branches of the service, are those for officers' chargers—one for middle and lightweight horses up to carrying from 160 to 180 pounds, and the other for heavyweight horses, up to carrying 210 pounds. In these military schooling, field performance, conformation, and appearance are especially considered.

Aside from these military classes, this year's national show will be replete with interest in that the various departments will demonstrate convincingly the public's allegiance to the horse for purposes of sport, pleasure, and utility, despite the universal adoption of the automobile. Saddle horses for indoor and outdoor riding were never so popular, and hunters are more in request then for several seasons past.

As discounting any reflection on the horse for fashionable driving and its supposed eclipse by the motor car, this year's classification is just as strong as ever, the appointment classes calling for handsome pairs to stanhope and ladies' phaetons, singles and pairs to stylish victoria and brougham, the "Sir James" Challenge Cup presented by the late Alfred G. Vanderbilt for gig horses, and the Waldorf-Astoria Cup for hackneys in single harness.

For four-in-hand teams to coaches there are four classes, including that in which a prize offered by Mrs. Alfred Vanderbilt will be competed for.

Last year public interest dwindled because of the general depression on account of the war. But the American temperament has now reacted and we are all feeling much better financially, commercially, and otherwise. There is every reason to hope, therefore, that this season's National Horse Show will eclipse in popularity any show of recent years.

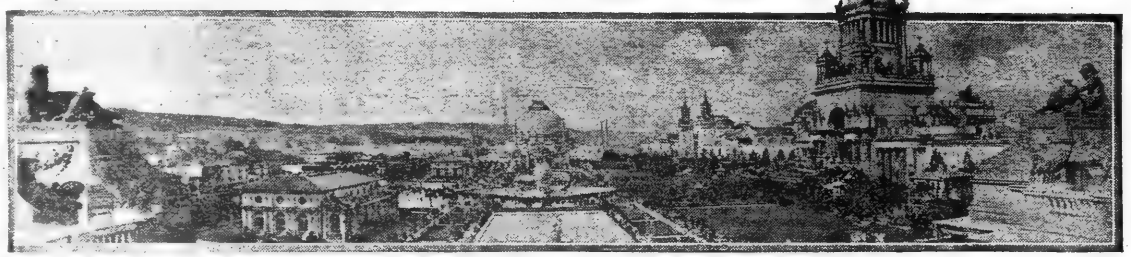
Panama-Pacific Exposition Is a Money Maker

It Has Eclipsed the Three Previous Big Undertakings of Its Kind and Will Return a Substantial Profit When It Closes, Instead of a Loss



A Glimpse of the Panama Exposition, Showing the Magnificent Tower of Jewels at the Right.

THE Panama-Pacific International Exposition has been so successful that the commissioners have decided to keep it open until Dec. 4, so that thousands of Americans who have been unable to get away in the Summer will have an opportunity of seeing its wonders.

It has eclipsed the three previous expositions held in the United States—at Philadelphia in 1876, at Chicago in 1893, and at St. Louis in 1904—by making a record as a financial success. In the beginning of September an official announcement was made that the attendance had averaged 70,000 daily and that all mortgages had been paid. The receipts for the sale of tickets at 50 cents each and for concessions continue to exceed the working expenses of the Exposition, so that the bondholders will receive a substantial profit on their investment instead of having a loss.

The rush to San Francisco began early in April, shortly after the special excursion fares on the railroads came into force, and has continued with very little abatement up to the present time. Tourist agents who had been looking forward with despair to the coming Summer season, and had discharged the greater part of their staff on account of the European war, found their offices packed daily with eager people wanting information. Booking clerks had to be called back to attend to the endless stream of men and women who wanted to see the wonderful exposition, with California and the Rockies thrown in as an additional inducement to go West.

One tourist firm booked over 150 personally conducted parties to the big Fair, and in another well-known agency on Broadway the railroad fares to California averaged over $5,000 a day, which was a record in over forty years' business experience.

Throughout the Summer the trains on all Western roads have been leaving Chicago in five and six sections, and yard masters have been at their wits' end to get sufficient sleeping cars to accommodate the immense pilgrimage to the West. The demands on the dining cars were so heavy that the managers of the department had to have supplies of provisions cached at out-of-the-way stations on the roads to replenish the empty larders.

There were not many European visitors at the San Francisco Exposition on account of the war, but their absence was made up for amply by thousands of South Americans from the Atlantic as well as the Pacific coasts.

During August and September hundreds of Cubans who have made fortunes through the sugar crop landed in New York and New Orleans to visit the Fair with their families. Thousands of Canadians have taken advantage of the reduced fares to travel through their own Rockies to Vancouver and Victoria and then to San Francisco and home via the American Rockies, or the Grand Canyon to Chicago and New York.

In addition to the extensive travel over the railroads, the Panama-Pacific Steamship Company has been carrying from 500 to 600 passengers through the canal to San Francisco on the steamers Finland and Kroonland each trip since May 1 until the canal closed a week ago. Over 250 special trains have been chartered from the railroad companies to convey members of big organizations from various cities to the coast to attend conventions, and the chief stopping points of interest on the way have shared the traffic boom with San Francisco.

The year of 1915 will be remembered by Californians for ages to come as the record year for their State. Millions of dollars were paid out on the construction of the great Exposition and the result has justified the expenditure. The visitors have been accommodated comfortably in hotels and boarding houses to suit all pockets, and meals at reasonable rates have been obtainable at all hours of the day and night.

The Exposition, situated along the north shore of San Francisco Bay, is easily accessible from all parts of the city by street car or jitney bus. In fifteen minutes the visitor can ride from the City Hall to the main entrance at the foot of Scott Street, where a green wall, made by boxes of ice plant held in by wire netting, forms a pleasant relief to the eye from the white, dusty road outside.

Passing through the gates into the grounds, the gorgeous, Oriental-looking Tower of Jewels comes into view. Its sides are decorated with 110,000 pieces of polished stained glass from Vienna, which are strung on wires and scintillate brilliantly in the sunlight as they are oscillated by the breeze. At night, with the powerful rays of twenty colored electric searchlights thrown upon it, the tower is really magnificent in its glittering radiance. The Tower of Jewels is really the central point of the Exposition from which all roads through the grounds appear to radiate, and where all regular frequenters of the Exposition meet one another.

Crossing the South Gardens, where all the big functions are held, one can look under the lofty arch of the Tower, artistically decorated in Oriental red, pastel blue, and burnt orange, the exterior color scheme of the big fair, and see the Column of Progress in the Court of the Universe that faces San Francisco Bay.

To the right of the Tower of Jewels is the Court of Palms, with its entrance archway decorated by two Italian towers that remind one of Venice and the Square of St. Mark in their architecture and soft coloring.

The Exposition is the largest of its kind ever erected, and to the pedestrian it appears a hopeless task to attempt to walk all over the grounds, which extend for three miles along the water front, and inspect the contents of the eight exhibit palaces and the Zone region.

Visitors can "do" the Exposition in three days and get a good idea of the buildings, their contents, and the grounds by going about it in a methodical manner from Scott Street to the Zone section at Van Ness Avenue on the right and then exploring the palaces on the left side, with the various State buildings and those of the foreign nations, as far as the Stadium.

Guides can be engaged at the Public Service Building, near Scott Street, at a charge of $1 per hour. They are all university students from different parts of the country and are well informed regarding the interesting features of the Fair. They are not allowed to accept tips.

Tired people can hire electric roller chairs at $1 an hour which have a speed of three miles and can be driven safely without any fear of accidents. There is also a motor-drawn train of little cars which carries people short distances from one building to another for 10 cents.

Order is kept and information given to the public by the Exposition Guards, who number 500 men and are quartered in a camp just outside the Fair grounds. They are smart, intelligent, well-set-up men from 25 to 40 years of age, and wear khaki uniforms with puttees and peak caps similar to the dress of the soldiers in the Philippines. The men have been carefully selected by the Fair officials and have mostly been non-commissioned officers or privates of good character in the United States Army.

The most picturesque building in the Fair grounds, in the general opinion of the visitors, is the Palace of Fine Arts, which faces a lagoon of placid water in which its symmetrical columns and beautiful architecture and the tall cypress trees near by are clearly reflected. In addition to a fine collection of the works of American artists there are some admirable specimens of the old masters in the British section.

New York State is represented by a handsome two-story building, next in size to the California State Building near by, which has cost $300,000 to erect.

The Amusement Zone is best seen at night when it is brilliantly lit up by hundreds of electric lights and thronged with visitors. It extends 3,000 feet, from Van Ness Avenue to Filmore Street, and contains various shows, which charge from 25 to 50 cents admission. The women of San Francisco have insisted that everything in the Zone be of a nature suitable for women and children.

Danger of Germanism for the United States

Theories of Government and Taxation Imported from France and Germany for American Adoption---Association of Past and Present Events

By Edward A. Bradford.

TESTIFYING before the Mills Legislative Committee upon taxation, Mr. Robinson, the spokesman of the real estate interests of New York City, said:

I don't want to think that conditions are exactly like those that preceded the French Revolution, but that is the fact. In the City of New York the burden of taxes is on the moderately rich and the poor man, and not on the rich. And this is the precise condition that existed in the French Revolution.

The colors are laid on thick to attract the attention of those not interested in taxation, through not appreciating that they pay taxes for which they receive no bill, and yet the parallel between our times and those of Robespierre, Danton, Marat, and Louis was drawn before Mr. Robinson by so sober an authority as David A. Wells, and so long ago as 1871, when also New York had a spasm over taxation like the present.

And they have more company than might be suspected. Senator Bailey in his farewell address said:

This Republic is near a crisis which is greater than the wisest men think. I do not forget that the French Revolution came while the Governors were at the theatre, and that they arose from the banquet table to come face to face with violence and bloodshed in the streets of Paris. I do not say that the United States is facing such a state of affairs, but I do maintain that if within the next thirty years the country should continue to change as it has in the last thirty years we will find ourselves face to face with such a situation at the end of that time.

Elbert H. Gary publicly said not long ago:

I say to you that things are being said and printed similar to the incendiary speeches which aroused the peasants of France, and caused the French Revolution. Unless something is done the spark will burst into flame.

Colonel Roosevelt said to the Paris Matin's representative:

Had France listened to Turgot she would have avoided great troubles, but the ultra-conservatives upset Turgot, and later Robespierre appeared with like perturbations. America must avoid such pitfalls.

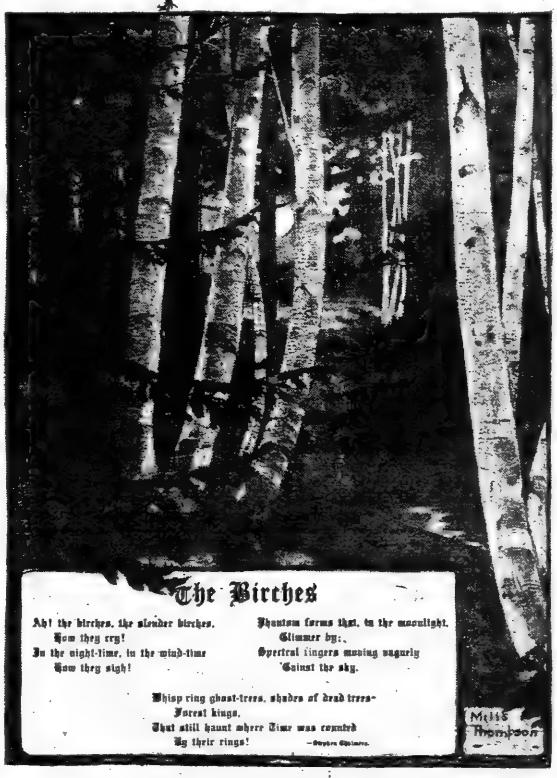
The list of leaders of thought who have declared that idea might be extended, and there is little doubt that the thought is even more prevalent privately. It seems worth while to examine what basis there is for it, perhaps to discover that there is both more in one way and less in another way than might be thought by those not taking trouble to keep themselves abreast of the ideals which our freedom of the press and speech makes articulate in a manner which might have prevented the French Revolution, and is a safety valve in our times.

The analogy between our times and those of the French Revolution is closer in quality than in degree. Tax extortion was one cause of the French Revolution. We have the same sort of taxation, but in such smaller quantity that it is extravagant to draw comparisons without bearing the limitation in mind, and applying the corrective before the analogy becomes closer. In France in the time of Louis only one-third of the land belonged to the lay community. Two-thirds belonged to the Church and the nobles. The taxes were so unequally laid that the most productive fell almost wholly upon the peasantry, neither the Church nor the nobility paying a sou.

The privileged class numbered about 190,000 in 25,000,000, and it was calculated that of 75 francs of produce from land 50 francs were paid in taxes, the landlord and the cultivator dividing between them the remaining third, or 12½ francs to each. The peasant belonged to the soil, that is, to the lord of the manor, and cultivated his meagre acres with the implements of Roman times. Even as late as the middle of the eighteenth century it was said "the men are dying as thick as flies, and the living are eating grass."

Those comparing our conditions with those of the French Revolution could have hardly had these facts in mind. Yet there is a basis for their declarations, for one of the first acts of the National Assembly of the Revolution was to repeal the personal tax which it is sought to enforce in New York City this year. The grounds of the repeal in 1789 were, and ought to be in 1916, first, that taxation which necessitates personal and arbitrary inquisitions is inconsistent with "the holy law of the liberty of the domicile"; and, second, that the requirement of oaths where self-interest tempts to perjury, and where the exact facts are difficult of discovery, is prejudicial to the morality of the State.

Accordingly the Fre[illegible] National Assembly repealed all law[illegible]equiring oaths by citizens and inquisit[illegible] by the State.



That is how France rid itself of the tax which now debauches the morality of our citizens, and for which some in authority are proposing to substitute the income tax, the twin of the personal tax, and subject to similar objections. The United States alone retains the personal tax. Other nations have the income tax, but there is no excuse for the United States imitating them when there are so many alternatives. The abounding wealth of this country and the fewness of our taxes would make it possible to raise all the money the Government ought to be allowed to spend without availing ourselves of the last expedients to which less fortunate nations are compelled to resort.

Although we declined to follow France in our taxation, we adopted so much that is French that our institutions owe more to France than to any other people, after England. "Liberty, equality, and fraternity" is not an exclusively French sentiment, but the phrase was born when our institutions were forming, and its spirit was embodied in the organization of all our institutions. Those who hold that Government derives its just authority from the consent of the governed are in sympathy with Rousseau's theory that the State is based upon a social contract. That is only another version of the ancient Stoic idea that the State originates by reason of a social instinct implanted in men by nature.

Friendliness, fraternity, co-operation were the characteristics of early American civilization, when all men were brothers, poverty was as nearly unknown as at any time or place in human experience, and extremes of wealth were such as would seem like poverty in our times. Envy, hatred, and uncharitableness no doubt existed, since they are human failings, but it was left to this generation to adopt them as the basis of a philosophy, to exalt covetousness as a virtue, and to make it the basis of a social philosophy which Germans preach, and a growing number of Americans practice without knowing where their fancies start or whither they lead. Socialism, the single tax, the redistribution of wealth are only branches of a broader principle, wider even than Marx's social theories, and born but recently in Germany.

It is only necessary to run over the partial list given above to be brought face to face with the contrast between the politics of our time and of the French Revolution. Humanity and things of the spirit dominated the men of those times. Materialism dominates the preachers most vocal among us. Instead of the equality of rights and freedom which prevailed in the constitutional era, we have many who think first of equality of possessions, not by equality of effort or merit, but by operation of law. There is no such inequality as the forcible equalizing of unequal things. Inequality is the law of nature and the right of free men. Just as we fought to establish equality of right, we must fight to establish the right of inequality inherent in differences of natural ability and in differences of social service.

The contrary doctrine is based upon might and hate, and is akin to the other German doctrine of military necessity which has horrified all humanity except German, if, indeed, there is German humanity where affairs of State are concerned. The German doctrine of the State in peace is as horrible as that of the State in war, and has most recently been expounded, with the greatest authority, by Franz Oppenheimer of the University of Berlin, and made known to Americans through the excellent translation by Dr. Gitterman of the New York bar. (Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill Company.)

That doctrine makes the State a means of exploitation of men by men, not a combination of men for the common good. According to this concept the State—

Is a social institution, forced by a victorious group of men on a defeated group, with the sole purpose of regulating the dominion of the victorious group over the vanquished. * * * This dominion had no other purpose than the economic exploitation of the vanquished by the victors.

The basis in reason of this abhorrent idea that the State is a combination of robbers of fellow men is worth understanding, for the thought lies at the root of much of the agitation of our times, and threatens to supplant the kindlier French theory of the State. The will to live is the single force which impels all life. This force branches into hunger and love as basic instincts of man. There are two means by which men satisfy these natural necessities—work and robbery. Work is the "economic means," in Dr. Oppenheimer's phrase. Robbery, the "unrequited appropriation of the labor of others," through the State, is the "political means." All history is merely a contest between the economic means and the political means.

In the earliest times, before there was a State, there were only two classes of men, those who lived from the soil and those who lived by hunting or herding in hordes. Both hordes lived in practical anarchy, in substantial equality of authority and possessions. The distinction between them is clear and necessary. The grubbers of the soil, with the crotch of a tree for a plow, are bound to the land in the necessity of the case. There is land for all, and nobody wants more than he can work, for there is no way of preserving the fruits of the soil. There is no object in robbery for the same reason. Therefore peasants are not warlike either in disposition or in physical characteristics. They are strong but slow, and untrained in the exercises which make for martial prowess.

It is otherwise with huntsmen and herdsmen. They develop qualities of combatants by the nature of their contests with the beasts. There is a motive for the possession of large herds which is lacking from the possession of huge estates of land. Animals reproduce themselves as land does not, and sustain themselves to a large extent, whereas the conquest of land is a constant and unequal combat with nature. There is an inducement to steal herds which is lacking in the case of land, when it is as free as air or water. And there is among herdsmen greater inequality of fortune than among peasants before the land is parceled out.

Here Dr. Oppenheimer finds the origin of the State, in robbery by sea and land, by pirate Vikings and nomad cattle thieves. Raiders afloat and afoot or on horseback enriched themselves at the expense of the peasants and organized the State to exploit their fellow-men. Their prisoners of war were the first slaves, and thus the source of that difference of classes within the State which is the characteristic of every polity of history. The form of dominion is born thus.

All that is lacking to complete the State is to attach the herdsmen and Vikings to the soil. This is accomplished by warfare against the peasants, who are another sort of slave. The rest is matter of detail. At first the pirates and cattle raiders killed the peasants, as bears overturn hives to get honey, regardless of the bees. At a later stage the thieves are like beekeepers who take the honey but preserve the bees, for the reason that live bees are the only sort that work for their keepers.

In this way the peasants obtain a semblance of right to their houses, their implements, and food enough to carry them over to the next crop. The moment when the first conqueror spared his victim in order to exploit him in productive work is the birth of the State in principle and the key to all modern economic develop-peasants. Just as keepers guard their bees, so the conquerors of the peasants guard them, and the peasants come to look on their conquerors and exploiters as their defenders and saviors. Soon they bring their tribute instead of having it taken by violence, and, in consideration of the greater convenience of the latter method, the previous irregularities in the collection of such taxes by fire and murder are abandoned.

The dominion and exploitation thus established are justified everywhere by similar arguments. The master group naturally places highest value on the qualities by which it became such. Hence the high esteem placed on martial qualities. The exploited or subject group obviously is the inferior, and there are imputed to it laziness, cowardice, trickiness, and, worst, of all, inefficiency. Revolt, therefore, on its part is revolt against the good and the great, if not against God Himself. That is why the priests are on the side of the aristocrats, and that is the origin of the class distinctions in all countries in all times. How vital these thoughts are today appears clear to those who recognize this world war as one stage in this development of the State.

Dr. Oppenheimer is a prophet as well as a historian and theorist of history. He conceives how States decay as well as are born, and has a remedy for the approaching catastrophe of civilization. States which are based on exploitation—as all have been—die because they exhaust the material of exploitation; that is, the peoples die, a calamity surpassing the death of nations. Primitive slavery remained harmless so long as the economic system was based on exchange and use of goods in kind. Exploitation which is fatal to peoples and States is the result of economic development sufficient to introduce the use of money. When slave labor is used to produce goods sold to a market for money exchangeable for other goods, exploitation of inferiors proceeds apace. Those who have lands and those who have slaves have advantages over those who have none. The law of "agglomeration about existing nuclei" operates. In more familiar phrase, the rich become richer and the poor become poorer. There arises monopoly of land. The great estates which used to supply their own needs buy and sell for money, while the free citizens abandon the unequal contest with slave labor and drift to the city.

A like process takes place in the trades. The middle class disappears. There is born a proletariat or propertyless class, dependent on the capitalists in land and industry, and yet sovereign through the birth of democratic institutions. There is an immense depopulation of the soil, and a literal consumption of population. The crisis comes, as Macaulay predicted it would come for this country, when there was no more land available for occupation. Ground rent is the origin of all economic woes.

It is at this stage that the similarity of conditions to our own becomes striking. The single taxers are active as never before, but their cry is infantile beside the German theory, of which the single tax is only a detail. To the single taxers rent is robbery of the individual. To the German theorist the land tax is but a single phase of the exploitation of classes by the "political means"—that is, the State itself is the robber of the surplus product of the "economic means." This is the interpretation of all politics up to this time.

There now must be a new politics devised to restore the surplus of the economic means to those who produce it. But the remedy is to be found in economics, not in politics. The State of the future must have no classes. It must consist only of free citizens. There must be no State, but only society. History records the ever victorious combat of the economic means against the political means. Of necessity there must be a tendency toward letting the people live, and to check their exploitation, or otherwise they would perish in the land. Never was this tendency so strong as under modern conditions of communications and commerce. Such interstate relations constantly acquire preponderating importance over diminishing warlike and political relations—the theory was born before the world war—movable capital, the creation of peace, prevails over landed property rights, the creation of war.

The ownership of large estates is the last stronghold of the political means, the sole survival of feudalism. There is no difference in principle between the distribution of the total products of the economic means among the separate classes of a constitutional State, the so-called capitalistic distribution, from that in the feudal State. There is an oversupply of laborers politically free and economically without capital. There are two laborers running after one master, and lowering the wages of each other. Therefore the "surplus value" of their product remains with the capitalist class, "while the laborer never gets a chance to form capital for himself and become an employer."

The existence of large landed estates is the source of the oversupply of free laborers. They emigrate from the estates into the towns and over sea. Their disappearance to other lands raises the rate of wages, and produces competition from the products of their labor overseas which reduces the value of the products of the estates. Thus ground rent is attacked from two sides, and there is hope that two masters will run after one laborer, and raise the price of wages on themselves. Then there will be no surplus value for the capitalist class, since the wage earners can become capitalists. In that happy day "well-being" will supplant "wealth," and control over articles of consumption will supplant dominion over mankind. The State will decompose, and a society of equals will succeed the exploitation of classes by the political means. Capitalism will disappear with ground rentals. Thus it appears what a weak and poor lot our single taxers are compared with Dr. Oppenheimer, and this German theory of the State.

This German theory of the State, formed according to economics along lines of which we have no experience, deals with antiquity of which there are no records, and of a future no better known to Germans than to others. All may be as Dr. Oppenheimer describes and predicts, and nobody can certainly say him nay. His philosophy is contained in many books, showing both learning and ingenuity, yet with objections to the adoption of his policy similar to the objections to the analogy between our times and those of the French Revolution.

Just as no considerable numbers of us are "eating grass," so no considerable numbers of us are so much worse off than in feudalism that they would be willing to return to the conditions of the times when there existed the free citizens whom he would restore as a single class of society. The doctor perceives that this is so, and makes an exception of this happy land, which is not made by those among us following his philosophy without being aware of it.

The migration of citizens over seas has recruited our workers, and has made our wealth among all classes the wonder and envy of the world. It is clear, moreover, that the world contains no hordes which it is reasonable to suppose will overrun this continent as Europe was overrun from the steppes, the womb of the children of the earth. The only possibility is the overrunning of America by Asiatics, but against that we are forearmed because forewarned to the point of overcaution by many.

It is plain also that there is danger in abolishing capitalism in the hope of retaining its benefits. The slaves of steel which have displaced human labor motors, and have supplied the world with unprecedented abundance, must have their upkeep more certainly than human slaves. They do not breed, and they must be kept paid, or they will stop without the possibility of stimulating them with the whip or by hunger. There is particular danger of applying the German theory to the subdivision of large landed estates. If the production of food is the object it would be better that the large landlords should adopt the methods of capitalism.

Small farming is the most uneconomic of all present productive processes. It is not the immigration of cheap labor which has enabled us to produce agricultural products so cheaply that ground rents in Europe have fallen ruinously. It is because of large-scale farming with implements impossible of production without the factory system and capitalism. The gang-plow and the harvester and gasoline tractors have made it impossible for Europe to compete without adopting similar methods. It would be better that Europe and even Asia should imitate us than that we should listen to those who prescribe for us a remedy based upon European conditions.

No doubt it is a reproach to our institutions that there are poverty and hunger among us, despite our wealth and abundance. But those conditions are being attacked with more heart and intellect than the world has ever witnessed before. When the worst is said, nobody can deny that conditions were never better on any general view, and that the outlook is rather promising than desperate. Travelers in the desert remember the oasis they leave and depict to themselves the oasis they hope to reach. Always they are in the desert, and the grateful grass and water never are with them on the journey.

There are among us those who are not traveling from oasis to oasis, and who are without happy recollections or hopeful prospects. For them there is nothing but the desert, and their greatest happiness is the misery ahead. The destruction of the State for the sake of substituting a theoretically superior society is just the gospel they need. Patriotism is a better road to Dr. Oppenheimer's goal, for Americans at least. More progress will be made by traveling the familiar road than by diversion along untraveled paths, be they described never so alluringly by the most learned of philosophers who never have traveled them.

Detective Stories Inspired as Are Poems

So Says Burton E. Stevenson, Who Writes Mystery Tales and Edits Poetic Anthologies---He Gives a List of Dont's for Would-be Conan Doyles

By Joyce Kilmer.

DR. WATSON has found a friend at last. Of course, there is always the great Sherlock Holmes, but Mr. Holmes's friendship was not purely disinterested. He liked to have the gentle and astonished Doctor with him as audience and errand boy. But seldom did he give him so much as a word of praise.

But now there appears an enthusiastic defender of Dr. Watson; a man who says that the Doctor, or some one closely resembling him in simplicity and appreciativeness, is necessary in good detective fiction; and that not the great detective himself, not the actual creator of the book, but Dr. Watson himself is the ideal person to tell the story. And the man who says this is Burton Egbert Stevenson, author of "The Mystery of the Buhl Cabinet," "That Affair at Elizabeth," and many another exciting mystery tale.

"Of course Dr. Watson is necessary," he said to me the other day. "It seems to me that the foil to the detective plays a very important part in fiction of this sort. He represents the general public; he is mystified, enlightened, surprised, as the general public is mystified, enlightened, and surprised.

"And it seems to me that Dr. Watson—that the foil—should be the narrator. You see, the story should be told in the first person. If it is told in the third person it is evident that the omniscient narrator has information which he is concealing from the reader; therefore, he is not playing fair with the reader, as the writer of this sort of work should do. If the great detective himself tells the story there can be no surprise. He must reveal his deductions and conclusions as he goes along; he will not be surprised, and the reader will not be surprised—that is, unless he holds back a part of his information, thereby not playing fair with the reader.

"And so the only way in which the story can be told without reservations from the reader is for the foil to tell it, as in the Sherlock Holmes stories. Then the foil, being also the narrator, keeps even with the reader in his acquisition of information, and the climactic surprise comes naturally to them both."

"Then you believe," I said, "that it is unfair for the writer of a detective story to base his climax on an idea not hitherto introduced into the story?"

"I think that that is a fault," said Mr. Stevenson. "The writer of a detective story, or of a mystery story (for the sort of story that I have in mind need not have a detective for one of its characters) must above all things play the game with his reader. He must put all his cards on the table; he must not keep one up his sleeve and then pull it out and slap it down at the end of his book.

"He must not, in other words, astound his reader by an unexpected dénouement, but he must astound the reader by giving an unsuspected twist to the dénouement which he does suspect.

"Even in Gaboriau's stories you sometimes find the fault to which I refer. In the first part of the book he will elaborately create a mystery; he will do it very skillfully and the reader will be intensely interested. Then for the unraveling of this mystery he will refer back to the grandfathers and grandmothers of his hero and heroine; he will bring up some old feud or family tragedy that dates back to the days of the Empire.

"This certainly is not playing fair with the reader. If that feud or family tragedy was necessary to the story the reader should have known about it at the beginning of the book. All the cards should have been on the table.

"Nevertheless, Gaboriau is still the best of the writers of mystery tales. I think that the greatest moment in all mystery fiction is the clock instance in 'The Case of Orcival.'

"You remember the circumstances. There was a room in terrible disorder, and among the wreckage on the floor was a clock which had stopped with the hands pointing to 8. Or was it to 5? At any rate, the fact that the clock had stopped at that hour seemed to indicate that the crime had been committed at that hour.

"But the great detective was not satisfied with this conclusion. So he started the clock going—and it struck 11! In my opinion that is the very greatest moment in all mystery fiction.

"You see," said Mr. Stevenson, "a mystery story is like a piece of mathematics. Writing mystery stories is an exact science. And the construction of the plot is the writer's most important problem.

"The reason for Archibald Clavering Gunter's success was that he was really a genius at plotmaking. He could not write, but he could make wonderful plots. His book 'That Frenchman' has a terrific plot, but the style of it is absolutely puerile. Gunter had great plots, but he wrote in about the manner of Horatio Alger, Jr."

I asked Mr. Stevenson what he considered to be the great test of a detective story.

"The great test of a detective story," he answered, "is merely whether or not the current of the story is strong enough to carry the reader along and make him surprised and pleased at the end. I have no patience with the reader who tries to work out the solution of the plot ahead of the author. That is not what he is supposed to do; he should be swept along with the current of the story.

"The trouble with many stories is that the climax is merely a surprise, a bit of guesswork. It should be logically inevitable. The greatest detective story is the story the conclusion of which is reached with absolute logic."

There may be people so unfortunately lofty of forehead as not to read detective stories, and therefore to be ignorant of Mr. Burton E. Stevenson's successes in this field. But if they read poetry, they must know of Mr. Stevenson's distinguished achievements as an anthologist—particularly of that fat and admirable red volume called "The Home Book of English Verse." It may be that his occupations of compiling collections of poetry and writing mystery stories suggested to Mr. Stevenson the ideas which he advanced concerning the connection of the mystery story and the poem. And it may be that his two chief interests furnish a proof of the theory which he propounded.

"Any real detective story," he said, "is in the beginning as much a matter of inspiration as is any poem. If Edgar Allan Poe's 'To Helen' is an inspired work, then so is 'The Murders in the Rue Morgue.'

"Every poem, every great poem, starts with inspiration, and its development is conditioned by the limitations of language, by the use of words that rhyme. So every great detective story starts with inspiration, and its development is conditioned by logic. And, as I said before, the greatest detective story is the one of which the logic is strictest.

"Of course this is not true of other forms of fiction. In the novel of character, for example, logic plays only a small part. But the detective story is a highly artificial thing. It really is a piece of sleight of hand.

"Certainly there are many instances of the close connection which obtains between poetry and mystery stories. The instance that comes first to mind is that of Edgar Allan Poe. But there is Conan Doyle; he has written many really fine poems. Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch, an admirable poet and critic of poetry, wrote in 'Wandering Heath' and 'The Pavilion on the Links' two of the best of modern mystery stories. And there is Browning's 'The Ring and the Book'—a splendid murder mystery done into verse.

"The greatest writers have not disdained to play the game of mystery story writing. There is Henry James's 'The Turn of the Screw.' There is Thackeray's 'The Notch of the Axe'—one of the best of thrillers.

"Wilkie Collins was master of mystery—'The Moonstone' is a classic of its sort. And Charles Dickens—well, of course, he wrote a number of detective stories, but his greatest mystery story—one of the greatest of all mystery stories, because its mystery is still unsolved—is 'Edwin Drood.'

"I went all over the ground of that story when I was in Rochester. I thought that if I got a clearer idea of the locality I might be able to find the solution which Dickens intended.

"But Dickens had modified the locality so greatly that my study of the Cathedral Close and its neighborhood threw no light on the mystery. I am inclined to agree with Andrew Lang in his belief that Dickens had got tangled up in his web of complications, and that he himself didn't know how the story was going to end.

"You see, the story was appearing as a serial before he had finished writing it. So Dickens couldn't do what most writers of detective stories find necessary of the story and change it to suit the end.

"I think there is truth in the theory that anxiety over 'Edwin Drood' hastened Dickens's death. You know, he got up from working on that novel, walked to the dinner table, and dropped dead.

"One of the biggest of modern detective stories," said Mr. Stevenson, "is Moffat's 'Through the Wall.' 'The Man Without a Head,' by Tyler De Saix is good, but there is too much machinery in it. The central character in it is a sculptor who makes images of the heads of the people whom he designs to kill, and then masks himself to resemble them so that he can walk away unharmed after killing them.

"In the best detective stories there is seldom any elaborate machinery introduced. This business of introducing a death-dealing ball at the end of a cord, of having a special sort of house, a secret staircase, an ingenious hiding place, and that sort of thing is wrong. In the modern detective story there should be a modern house in a modern city—all the setting should be commonplace. In the Sherlock Holmes play Professor Moriarty's underground office with its door opened by a lever at his desk is highly artificial.

"The best of the Sherlock Holmes stories is 'Silver Blaze'—it is the most consistently logical of his stories. 'The Speckled Band' is interesting chiefly because the idea is so outré. 'The Red-Headed Men's League' is one of the most effective of these stories because the start is so far from the finish. But the end of that story is rather weak."

Burton E. Stevenson.

Mr. Stevenson is at work now on the solution of a mystery. A French writer of detective stories proposed this mystery as an impossible plot, as a situation which no novelist could explain. Here it is, as Mr. Stevenson outlined it to me:

"Imagine," he said, "a little French village, resting in the peace of a Summer afternoon. An automobile speeds in and comes to a sudden stop. A woman leans out of the window of a nearby house, tears a sheet of red paper across twice, scatters the four pieces to the winds, and goes back into the house. The automobile leaves the village. Two days later there is a wedding in the village. But as the bride approaches the altar she drops dead. In her hand she holds one of the pieces of red paper. There are three other sudden and mysterious deaths, and in every case one of the pieces of red paper is found gripped in the fingers of the corpse. The French writer said that this mystery could not be solved, but I think it can."

Mr. Stevenson is inclined to believe that Poe's ability as a writer of detective stories has been overrated.

"Poe only wrote three detective stories," he said, "and one of these is a failure. He tried to work out the mystery of the death of Mary Rogers—Mary Roget, he called her. But he failed. There is a legend to the effect that a British officer came to Poe and confessed that he had committed the murder in the way in which Poe described it in his story, but this legend has never been verified. Poe spent days going over the scene of the crime, but he failed to bring the story to a satisfactory conclusion.

"And I have never been entirely convinced by the psychology of Poe's 'The Purloined Letter.' You know the point of the story is that a thing for which people are seeking is best concealed when it is put in a place where it might naturally be expected to be. But the letter that escaped notice because it was placed in the letter rack was first crumpled and torn half across. Surely this was a mistake on Poe's part; a letter thus marked would attract attention to itself."

Mr. Stevenson does not believe that there is much resemblance between detective work in fiction and detective work in real life.

"Actual detection of crime," he said, "is simply a matter of investigation. If a piece of jewelry is lost, people go around to all the pawnshops looking for it. If a man has been wounded and then disappears, people go around to all the doctors and ask them questions, and to all the taxicab drivers and other people who might have seen the wounded man. It is all done on a wholesale scale, and patience is the chief quality displayed. This process is, of course, too cumbersome to use in a story."

As every magazine editor will testify, detective stories are being written by the thousand, and very many of them fail to find their way into print. I asked Mr. Stevenson how he thought ambitious writers of this sort of story could best prepare themselves.

"The best training for a writer of detective stories," he said, "is newspaper work. Of course, that is the best training for a writer of any sort, if he gets out of newspaper work in time. He gains facility, he learns not to take himself too seriously, he is brought into contact with all kinds of people, he goes to all kinds of places, and he gains the power of writing in any circumstances. And particularly valuable to the writer of detective stories is the opportunity which newspaper work affords of getting a view of phases of human nature which most people do not suspect.

Here is a list of "Don'ts" for the guidance of all who desire to have people breathlessly follow the adventures of their lynx-eyed sleuth. Mr. Stevenson is a successful writer of detective stories, as well as a shrewd critic of them, so this is eminently practical:

"Don't invent any intricate machinery to confuse the reader's mind.

"Don't make utterly innocent people act as if they were guilty. Innocent people do not act as if they were guilty.

"Don't base your plot on an unfinished sentence or an incomplete exclamation. The world has little patience with stories which hinge upon the fact that the heroine refused to take advantage of the opportunity to relieve the hero's mind by telling him that she was there at 3 instead of at 2, or that it was her sister who wore the green dress, or something of the sort.

"Don't have your hero assume the sins of the villain.

"Don't have your detectives possess some personal information which no one else possesses. A detective must have the same data and the same sources of information as every one else. This is a fundamental requisite for good detective fiction. One admirable thing about the Sherlock Holmes stories is the way in which Holmes always gets his information from the newspapers. They get into the railway carriage, you know, and Holmes asks Watson to read him the newspaper account of the case.

"Don't let your story have merely an impossible solution. It must have the one inevitable solution. Don't, for the sake of the effect, allow your story to end with an absurdity."

Canada's New Railway Has Big Future

Just Completed Sections, Linking Together a Huge Chain of Roads, Comprise More Railway Mileage than Has Ever Before Been Opened at One Time

A STRIP a hundred miles wide, extending from coast to coast, was added to the attainable vistas of Canadian territory on Oct. 19 when the first train over the new Canadian Northern Transcontinental Railway rolled into Vancouver carrying eighty members of the Canadian Parliament and some hundred other public officials, railroad engineers and newspaper men, assembled from all parts of Canada and the United States, to take part in the opening of a new era in the development of the Dominion.

Since 1896 this new railroad system, which opens up to settlers something like a million square miles of the richest agricultural land in Canada, has been quietly and unostentatiously covering the middle section of Canada with a gridiron of steel rails. To the observant its trend and ultimate objective were plain. Yet outside of Canada and even in many sections of the Dominion it attracted so little attention that the progress of this first transcontinental train, triumphantly heralded throughout the continent, has been a revelation and a surprise.

Along the St. Francis Valley, Quebec.

In part this is due to the manner of the system's upbuilding. It started nineteen years ago with a modest eighty-five-mile railroad from Gladstone to Dauphin, Manitoba. Its name was the Manitoba & Northwestern Railway and Canal. The canal part of it, by the way, never was built, and probably never will be. The railroad had a single track and a single passenger train which ran out of Gladstone in the morning as Train No. 1 and bravely returned in the afternoon as Train No. 2, and it was characteristic of the Scottish sense of humor in the builders and proprietors that the time table contained a solemn notice that "Train No. 2 will not leave the terminal until after the arrival of Train No. 1."

It was also characteristic of their shrewdness that this particular eighty-five miles of territory through which the railroad ran was already noted as the best wheat growing land in the Province and has since fully justified its reputation. A farmer who met the first transcontinental train at Dauphin proudly exhibited to the Canadian legislators samples of his newly gathered wheat crop which had averaged seventy-two bushels to the acre and had netted him seventy-nine cents per bushel.

This first little railroad made money, although the franchise for its construction had gone a-begging for years before it was started. There followed branch lines which doubled, then trebled, its traffic; then an extension to Portage La Prairie; then more little railroads on the prairies, most of them on the same modest scale.

In course of time the proprietors of these lines went east and acquired the Great Northern Railway on the north shore of the St. Lawrence River, between Montreal and Quebec, tapping an immense pulp wood area. Then came more railroads and still more, until the Canadian Northern Railway system, as these scattered lines had become, controlled more mileage in the three prairie Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta than any other Canadian railroad.

It has since increased until it has 10,000 miles in all.

Some six or eight years ago there were thirty individual railroads, built and acquired, which had been incorporated into the system. And then began the final stage of linking together these separate enterprises into a single railroad extending from Quebec to Vancouver. This is the huge task the completion of which Canada, much to its surprise, finds itself celebrating just now.

With the laying of the last steel link on this new transcontinental highway, the magnitude of the enterprise, the daring and tenacity of its projectors, stand revealed. In the last four years they have built 1,700 miles of railroad. Since their entry into the railroad field, nineteen years ago, they have added to Canadian resources a mile and a half of railroad track a day. The newly constructed sections just opened comprise alone more railway mileage than has ever been opened at one time in the world's history. And it has all been done without fuss or trumpeting. There are people in Canada who can hardly believe that it is true.

Naturally, the personalities of the men whose imaginations conceived this gigantic enterprise and whose forcefulness and tenacity have carried it against tremendous obstacles to a successful conclusion, are not the least interesting part of the whole. They are two—Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann. Sir William is usually credited with being the originator. He is also the financier and the negotiator who has made the achievement possible. Sir Donald is the executive, the builder whose forcefulness and executive ability carried the plans through. Neither is a talker.

"I prefer to do things rather than to talk about them," said Sir William Mackenzie in replying to a series of congratulatory addresses on his way with the first train across the continent. Sir Donald Mann is credited with having avoided the transcontinental celebration so that he wouldn't have to talk at all. Sir William is slight, nervous, magnetic. Sir Donald is six feet two inches, broad-shouldered, and silent.

In the early eighties William Mackenzie was a Canadian school teacher who felt himself miscast, so went to railroad building on the Canadian Pacific then making its way through the mountains of British Columbia to the coast. Donald Daniel Mann, who had been a lumberman, was then bossing a construction gang on the same work. Some time in those days they got together. So many things have happened since that probably neither of them remembers very distinctly where and how it was. An interviewer once asked Sir Donald about this.

"Gee!" he said, after thoughtfully rolling his cigar from side to side under his heavy mustache. "Gee! I wish I could tell you."

The new line to the north of Lake Superior runs through a spruce forest, where thirty million cords of pulpwood await removal, with cheap water transportation only a few miles away, and a rich clay belt ideal for wheat growing beneath the timber when the settler of the future has cleared the ground. The rest of the line is through the richest prairie country and along the fertile valley of the Fraser River, already the scene of a prosperous mixed farming industry.

There is an additional feature which will, perhaps, be the greatest factor in the future. The greatest problem of an American transcontinental railway is grades. The line must cross the Rocky Mountains and continue over the Selkirk range, peaks rising to an altitude from 8,000 to 13,000 feet. There are few passes. The railroad which can cross the mountains at the easiest grade can haul the most freight and the greatest number of passengers across the continent at the least expense, and will have an immense advantage over its competitors.

The new road crosses the mountains through the Fellowhead Pass, an altitude of 3,716 feet, with a grade of .5 per cent. westbound and .7 per cent. eastbound. The next lowest in comparison is the Grand Trunk Pacific, with a 1 per cent. grade, and the grades of other transcontinental lines rise to a maximum of 2.6 per cent. in the case of the Santa Fé. This low grade enabled the railroad in the case of its first transcontinental special to carry a train of fifteen heavy passenger coaches drawn by a single ordinary locomotive across the Rockies at an average speed of more than thirty miles an hour. It was a record in American railroad travel.

To the average American, however, the most interesting question in connection with the new railway will be as to the scenery opened up by it. There is nothing lacking in this respect. From Ottawa west to Winnipeg the train travels through alternate vistas of prairie, in late Summer and Fall golden with a bounteous wheat crop, and deep forest interspersed with silvery streams. Thence westward lies more prairie, then gradually come into view the snow-clad summits of Mt. Robson, the tallest mountain in the Canadian Rockies, Mt. Geikie, Pyramid, and Roche Miette, and for a day long the train winds through a changing panorama of fir-clad mountain slopes from whose cloud-hung tops trail silver glaciers till night brings a pause and the traveler awakes to find himself traversing a steep canyon below which rush the Thompson and Fraser Rivers.

And thus the journey continues till the canyon becomes a smiling valley and the train rolls across the broad Fraser into the bustling City of Vancouver.

It is a picturesque journey throughout, but perhaps its most picturesque feature is one that may arise in the mind that knows the history of this enterprise, and that is how two Canadian empire builders of these days dreamed of such a railroad, tenaciously pursued their dream, and though beginning with almost nothing and encountering every obstacle overcame them all and built a great railroad extending from sea to sea.

One Or Two Interesting Museum Possibilities

The Most Important Pictures in America in Private Collections---Need of a Small Museum of Selected Works.

EVERY thoughtful lover of art is conscious that, while America's wealth in pictures is such that special students of the masters of painting must visit this country before they can hope to know their subject thoroughly, the great pictures are for the most part in private collections. The energy of our private collectors has brought across the ocean examples of Holbein and Titian, Vermeer, Velasquez, Botticelli, Raphael, Veronese, Van Dyck, Daumier, Cézanne, Degas, and Corot which compare favorably with those in the European galleries, and in certain instances are finer than anything that can be found in the same kind in Europe. This has been brought about by the willingness of our collectors to go to great lengths in spending their money rather than accept debatable examples. Once upon a time an American collector would have idled forth across the water and brought back objects of art in which he would have been satisfied personally to believe without the support of outside opinion. Once in a while masterpieces were thus obtained. More often the works were second and third rate. Not very much money was involved, no one seriously suffered, and a charming personal experience was enjoyed.

The case now is wholly different. Most of the great collectors are frankly planning that their collections shall pass in time to the public either as bequests to museums such as Mr. Altmann made or as integral separately housed collections such as Mr. Freer has provided for at Washington. It has become a matter not only of personal but of national pride with them that only the finest obtainable works by the greatest masters be included in their galleries. They seldom assume to judge which are the finest and who are the greatest. They exercise their trained power of judgment upon the men they select to choose for them, and, with a mingling of shrewdness and diffidence highly characteristic of the national temper, they refrain from imposing their opinions. In the course of their experience their taste naturally ripens and becomes more certain and few of them ignore the dictates of their taste, but they remain considerate of the fact that they are buying not for themselves alone, but ultimately to satisfy the needs of the splendid young country which will inherit from them the most beautiful objects possible to gather from all the other countries of the world.

As a result of this temper of mind on the part of a comparatively small number of rich men, the United States already is becoming a mecca for the pilgrims of art. The pictures, tapestries, porcelains, potteries, and other objects of aesthetic interest that are coming here in rapidly increasing numbers derive from the noblest sources and in many instances achieve a degree of merit impossible to surpass. Thus there is hope for our public collections, and possibly the certainty of this hope, as well as the scale of prices established, obstructs initiative on the part of the museums. What we do need in New York is a museum that shall contain only great works, a museum to which the public may go with the assurance of seeing there works worthy of serious attention so presented as to inspire a sympathetic mood uninterrupted by unworthy juxtapositions.

We recall Gallery XXIV. in the Metropolitan Museum many years ago when Titian's noble "Aretino" hung there, companioned by the El Greco and the Rubens Holy Family, the Lotto, and other interesting works, some of them of first importance, gathered together on a "Salon Carre" plan. Such a plan carried out on a larger scale and in a more exacting spirit would provide for New York an institution of great influence.

The Children's Museum of Art in Boston.

Fitz Roy Carrington's admirable idea for a Children's Museum of Art in Boston is in process of being worked out, and now that the Autumn season has begun there is renewed activity on the part of those interested in the scheme. The Settlements Museum Association is incorporated, with John D. Adams for President, Paul J. Sachs and Mrs. Catherine Saunders for Vice Presidents, B. Preston Clark for Treasurer, and Mr. Carrington for Secretary. This association is carrying on the project of the Children's Museum, the building for which is not yet erected. Mr. Carrington's plan is to have ultimately not only one, but a group of buildings, which shall be built and maintained without municipal aid, and which shall contain works of art that will appeal to children under 14 years of age. It is also expected that in time there will be handicrafts carried on in connection with the museum. The first building has been planned and will be a structure so simple and practical as to be in itself an architectural lesson and example. It is to be of red brick, one story high, and lighted with French windows, without troublesome flights of steps, (a detail that will draw to its collections a large number of citizens with fifty-year-old arteries,) with clean tiles on the floor, and with a minimum of ornamentation, consisting chiefly of sculptured heads of children of the Italian Renaissance looking down with the engaging Italian smile on the visiting children of the neighborhood.

The objects to be placed in the museum will be of three classes, those of such value that a fireproof building is required for their installation, those that may be lent to settlements and institutions but which may not be taken into the homes of the children, and those that may be taken into such homes and kept there for a considerable length of time—colored prints, for example. The general scheme is based on the public library system. There will be the central building, which will be open free the year around; the settlement houses will correspond to the branch libraries, from which suitable objects will be lent as in the libraries books are lent, the objects too valuable for lending having a permanent home where they may be consulted at will. In this way many more people can be reached than from one large centre without subordinate distributing branches.

Fitz Roy Carrington's Boston Scheme for a Children's Museum to Provide Training in Art Appreciation.

It is interesting enough to consider Mr. Carrington's plan with reference to its effect upon the children of his recently adopted city. The effect hardly can fail to be salutary, even though it should not achieve all that he hopes for it. Children respond quickly to civilizing influences, remember them long, and readily put them to practical use in their lives. Almost equally important, however, is the starting of a small museum on intelligent lines. In such a country as ours, with so heterogeneous a population and such widely separated centres of art, it is impossible for any one museum, however large, to reach many people or do much toward raising the general standard. Small museums are desirable in every city, but most of all desirable in the large cities, toward which float all sorts and conditions of men and to which the population at large looks for its standards of taste. The small museum is a logical agent of culture. There is danger, however, of establishing small museums with too much regard for the limitations of the public, too much of compromise with the present standard of public taste, and too little firm decision in favor of the best, and nothing but the best, as worthy of the people. If we should have a series of small museums comparing with the series of private collections that are making our country justly famous in the eyes of the world, we could well afford to supplement these with minor institutions for kindergarten work in art appreciation. This would establish our regard for quality as infinitely preferable to quantity in art, and in no other way can this fundamental discrimination be impressed upon the public mind. If we try first, and with persistence, for the best, we may not have time to get down to the very bad.

Chinese Paintings

At the Montross Galleries until Nov. 20 an exhibition of Chinese art will be on view. The place of honor in the main gallery is held by three portraits, one of a scholar, the second of a historian, the third of a military man who also is a noble of high rank, as the design on an embroidered panel of his costume testifies. It is extremely interesting to observe the discriminations of character made by the artists of this most astute race in portraiture of this order. The face of the scholar is that of a thinker and philosopher, to whom the fluctuating aspect of the world presents material for amused reflection. Nothing more impersonal, aloof, and instructed can be imagined than this old, wise, disillusioned or unillusioned physiognomy. The historian, on the other hand, looking backward into the annals of the world, is bored by his knowledge, his expression is that of satiety and indifference, without the element of pleasure that quickens into life the features of his comrade. The portrait of the noble is candidly stupid. Here is a warrior who knows nothing beyond obedience to orders, who would lower his head and charge an enemy in sublime apathy.

The execution of the three pictures is a characteristic combination of freedom and boldness with minute accuracy. The passionate truth of the flowing outlines is the result of supreme skill in draughtsmanship and close observation. There is practically no interior modeling; volume, character, delicacies of surface modulation—all are expressed by the outline sweeping with firm distinction about the major forms. In some such way Holbein worked at the English Court; few portraits are more suggestive of the later method of Holbein than this effigy of the ancient scholar, or a still earlier and much smaller head of a man in a green robe which might, if such a thing were possible, have been the prototype of the great German's Windsor series of drawings.

Among the other paintings are two makimonos in which the curious may see developed the ancient game of polo as it marched from Mongolia toward India. The earlier painting is by far the more beautiful of the two. The date is given as early Ming, and the tone is the rich ivory of ancient scrolls. The episode represented is a general mix-up in the game when several players come together on the field. The players belong to the heavy Mongolian type strengthened by meat and millet, and women are playing with the men, amazons of such power and weight as to be hardly distinguishable from their companions of the opposite sex. They are using sticks with small hollowed triangular heads with which the ball apparently is scooped up and carried rather than driven forward.

In the second makimono, dating between two and three centuries later, the heads of the sticks are longer, and the players, all men, are mounted on small mules. The execution differs from that of the earlier work in important particulars, and the color is thinner and cooler. In the early picture there is but one subject, polo, and the richly toned ground is spotted with mellow blues and reds and greens that are in themselves decorative and that make a decorative pattern. In the later picture the artist has not been satisfied with this severe and agreeable restraint, but has let his fancy play over minor incidents that are charming and entertaining, but subtract from the singleness of impression. At the left is seen a nobleman and his retinue, advancing through the hilly landscape and crossing a stout bridge. Further on in the composition is a pavilion in which a teacher is holding converse with his followers. Then, passing some Bellinesque rocks, with fringes of gay flowers and ferns, one comes upon the polo players, not this time engaged in a dramatic scrimmage, but advancing in orderly course, and at the right is a large horse, looking a giant by the side of the little mules, and having his feet ignominiously tied, for purposes of shoeing or for some other reason not clearly apparent. In spite of the distracting effect of these side issues, the logical training of the artist has shown him how to press his natural material into purely decorative shapes. The rocks, with their wavelike markings, and the water that flows across them, the cheerful trimming of fern and flower, the bridge and the cavalcade, are so neatly pruned of extraneous and obstructive detail, so cleverly woven and twisted into the rather simple design, so firmly if persuasively forced out of a dangerous naturalism into a thoughtful convention, that the commonplace little work ingratiates by that sense of style, that dainty tact of felicitous presentation in which Eastern art at its tawdriest is rich.

Desert and Canyon

Bertha S. Menzler's paintings of the Arizona desert and of the Grand Canyon will be brought to New York from Detroit, where they are now on exhibition, the latter part of next week, and later will be shown at the Macbeth Galleries. They are, on the whole, the best desert pictures that have been seen here for many a year. They show not only response to the striking features of color and atmosphere by which all visitors, artists and laymen alike, are impressed, but a much more intimate knowledge of the character of the scenes than usually is shown. The painter obviously has lived night and day, morning and evening, with her landscape until she has learned to recognize its subtler and more sensitive aspects. No doubt she could have painted her picture of a hill bathed in the flame of sunset after a brief visit to the region, but such a picture as that of the tender gray valley under a blue sky hung with dazzling clouds could only have been conceived by a companion and friend. Even more interesting technically is the composition in which a dash of rain plays the leading part, and a small blue and gray hill study suggests wide distances and the solemnity of the desert places. The Indian girl looking toward a broad horizon is more commonplace in theme, but clever and fresh in handling. Altogether it is a group of pictures calling for the attention of all who care for the portraiture of nature in unfamiliar phases by an observer scrupulous for the true physiognomy of place. The artist has done more than circumnavigate her subject on the outside, which is the impression made by most painters who undertake deserts and canyons. Her "Grand Canyon," with all its intensities and extravagances, is eminently possible, a temperamental piece of landscape, a prima donna sacrificing all the bland charms of daily and homely life to the splendar of a supreme gift, but not in any sense a monstrosity.

Paintings by Mr. Demuth and Others at the Daniel Galleries.

Charles Demuth has an exhibition of water colors at the Daniel Galleries in which his delicate and elusive talent shows to the best possible advantage. Most of his subjects are flowers, and he shows himself one of the deeply initiated by paying as much attention to his background as an element of his composition as to his title theme. Thus when he paints an Autumn spike of crimson on which a blue butterfly hangs poised it is neither blossom nor butterfly that attracts the observer, but the weaving of colors into a fabric of glowing color. He is perhaps especially happy in his use of warm grays with blue, the sensitive fluttering of the shadowy tints and the curious depth suggested in their handling giving one the sense of cool grottos and the hollows of the woodlands.

It is interesting to compare his work with the drawings by Preston Dickinson in which line is the language and an equally expressive use is made of it. Mr. Dickinson breaks away from parallelism of line with vigorous interest in a more living effect. His lines run diagonally into his picture, diverge from the perpendicular, from the horizontal, do anything to avoid an empty grandeur. A rhythm that dominates his composition gives it dignity, the arrangement is flexible and interesting and full of the assymetric charm of ancient architecture.

A Coming Exhibition.

William Laurel Harris is organizing an interesting exhibition at the Avery Library, Columbia University. It will consist of examples of American industrial art and will be the most important exhibition of its kind to be held under the auspices of an American university. The manufacturers of silk furniture, and so forth, are to send the most artistic products of their factories, and the exhibits are to be arranged in something the same fashion as in the exhibition last Winter at the National Museum in Washington, so as to give an integral effect to the rooms. The Proctor of the university, Professor William H. Carpenter, and the Librarian of the Avery Library, Edward R. Smith, are especially interested in making the exhibition a success and have placed its arrangement entirely in the hands of Mr. Harris.

A Source of Innocent Merriment

Had Religion.

HE was only a little fellow of not more than four years, and, as he entered the grocery store, his bare feet made such a slight noise that another customer, who had just been waited on, did not know of his presence until she turned to go and stepped squarely on one of the small toes.

"Oh, dear, did I hurt you?" she sympathized, as she realized her carelessness.

"Heil, no. I'm a Christian Scientist," came the reply as the boy clasped the injured member in both hands and hopped about on his other foot.

Lines to General Venustiano Carranza of Mexico

By Thomas R. Ybarra.

GREETINGS to you, bearded sage,
Peeping from your foliage.
You have certainly a case
Of a densely-wooded face.

Tell me, did your efforts stop
When you raised that hirsute crop,
Or does genius high and rare
Lurk among those groves of hair?

Is that capillary dome
Of tremendous thoughts the home,
Have you skill and strength and push
Hid in that primeval bush?

Do reformer's projects stir
In that mass of facial fur,
Economic problems press
On Your Royal Woolliness?

Have you jaws of iron, too,
Whiskered from the public view,
Or, as I have sometimes feared,
Are you principally beard?

Her Talent Revealed.

A VERY "green" Norwegian girl had come to this country in search of employment. She was taken into a household as a cook, but failed entirely to give satisfaction. Nearly everything she undertook resulted in failure, and finally the mistress of the house asked in desperation:

"Eda, is there anything you can do?"

"Yees," was the girl's reply.

"Well, tell me what it is," said the mistress.

"Ay can milk reindeer," said the girl calmly.

MY LOVE.

I'VE lost my heart to a woman fair,
Possessed of all the virtues rare.
She holds no store of vain regrets
Because I dote on cigarettes,
She feels no harm and sees no hurt
If now and then I chance to flirt,
And when I rave at things that be Without reserve agrees with me.

I hold the dame a dame divine,
Because her dreams are dreams of mine,
And whate'er thing betide the day,
She never questions what I say;
And if I linger with my friends
Finds nothing in it that offends,
And greets me ever with a smile
That's wholly free from taint or guile.

She hath a wondrous soft caress;
A mighty dainty taste in dress.
She hath an income of her own;
A natural voice upon the 'phone.
To gossip she hath never turned,
Nor deems her own sweet welfare spurned
If 'mid life's rush and roar and stir
I think of self, and not of her.

I love her with a love as true
And deep as is the Heavens' blue.
I love her with a love so vast
That when Eternity hath passed
'Twill still remain a sample of
The truly perfect type of love—
Yet am I stranger still to bliss:
I know not who or where she is!

"It takes a great poet to make poverty rhyme with wealth, pleasure with pain, and peace with war," said Merrick, discussing the Vers Libertines.

"Nonsense," retorted Herrick. "I am not a great poet, but I can make joy rhyme with ill, and not half try."

"Not with me you can't," said Merrick.

"Give me a pad, and I'll bet you a dinner I can," said Herrick. Whereupon he sat down and scribbled off the following:

"For living full of Peace and Joy Give me Chicago, Ill."

"Where shall we dine?" asked Merrick.

"See here, you," said the Subway Guard to the College Professor who was carrying a lighted cigar between his fingers, "you can't do that here. Chuck it away!"

Some Phyllis!

RECENTLY a poem entitled "An Indefensible Love Lyric," by Thomas R. Ybarra, appeared in THE NEW YORK TIMES. One of its verses ran as follows:

Phyllis, I would call you fairer
Than the fairest ever seen—
Than the Trojan's Greek ensnarer
And the proud Egyptian Queen.
I would sing: "The world uncovers Humbly, as she passes by,"
But, George Washington of lovers,
Phyllis, I can't tell a lie.

The rest was of like tenor.

Well, Phyllis has been heard from. She has sent from New Haven the following:

PHYLLIS'S REPLY.

Thomas, I should like to tell you
That you have a freckled face,
That your hair is red and stubbly,
All your movements void of grace;
That your figure's like a melon
And your eye like a black pill.
All of these I'd like to tell you,
And, by jingo, Tom, I will.

THE WOMAN WHO WON THE NOBEL PRIZE

Interesting Career of the Swedish Writer, Selma Lagerlof, and Her Remarkable Novel, "Jerusalem," Just Published in This Country—Latest Works of Fiction

JERUSALEM. By Selma Lagerlöf. Translated by Velma Swanston Howard. With an introduction by Henry Goddard Leach. Doubleday, Page & Co.

THERE is but one woman member of the Swedish Academy, the daughter of an obscure clergyman in a small Swedish hamlet, who was born in an old farmhouse and trained to be a teacher. So far, too, this woman is the sole member of her sex to receive the Nobel Prize for Literature. The bare sketch of Selma Lagerlöf's life is a romance as thrilling as ever that told of a fairy Princess, and it is difficult to believe that trolls and spells were not busy at her birth, and given to aiding her in wonder-working fashion through the years of her life. Small, quiet, shy, hard working, she pursued the course of her unexciting duties; in the intervals of her business of teaching she amused herself by filling pages with fanciful tales—first wild romantic stories in the fashion of Scott and other heroes of her youthful days; later in the telling of things nearer home. And sometimes she would smilingly make believe that she was a real writer, destined to write a great saga, and would turn to poetry and scribble more pages, only to tear them up later, and return to the real occupation of guiding children into the realm of knowledge.

Then, one day, she won a prize with a sketch she had been persuaded to enter in a competition, the sketch being a chapter from a book on which she had been working at odd hours for years. No one else had ever written just that sort of chapter before, and several discerning persons were deeply interested; among the rest the publisher of the paper that had given the prize. These persons wanted the book from which the sketch was taken. But there was no book, only a mass of material, odds and ends, loose chapters and episodes. It would take at least a year to weld these into final form. And Miss Lagerlöf must make her living.

Whereupon the fairy godmother of course appeared, and the Princess's future for the time needed to complete the book was provided for. She took the fairy gold and wrote the book, working day and night in a great frenzy of creative labor.

The book, "Gösta Berling," was published, and the Princess put on her crown and proceeded to live happy after. Not only did it take Sweden by storm, but it was translated into most modern languages, and was everywhere pronounced a masterpiece.

It was an extraordinary and beautiful story, and it was written in a style of singular clarity, and revealed what seemed an inevitable comprehension of the hearts of men and women, the strange workings of human nature. Here was a woman whose life had passed in what was close to isolation; to whom the experiences of love and motherhood had not come; a plain, unassuming, rather silent little woman, always troubled to make both ends meet, the ugly duckling in a big family whose other members were all married and settled, a playful, energetic crowd of youngsters who had early left the nest. Selma was the chimney-corner child, too timid to join in the boisterous play of her elder brothers and sisters, the little one who was always passed over.

And yet here in her book she appeared to understand every one, to have done and seen everything, to be at home with the wildest and fiercest, the greatest lovers, the hopeless, the strong, to know youth and age, to be surprised at nothing, to sympathize with points of view as far apart as good and evil. In her book was life in its thousand aspects, good and bad, subtle and simple, passionate and cold, presented with an art so simple and direct that it is only occasionally the reader realizes its beauty and effectiveness much as a traveler on a mountain trail, exhilarated by the inspiring air and busy with the problems of the path, is conscious only at pauses of the splendor of the view surrounding him.

After "Gösta Berling" there was no more teaching for Miss Lagerlöf. One book followed another, though slowly, for her work is unhurried. Here in America she is better known for her two books, written for children, "The Wonderful Adventures of Nils" and "The Further Adventures of Nils," than for her novels. But now that the Doubledays have taken her up, we shall surely have a chance to read all those of her books which have been translated into English, and to hope that the rest, if there are any, will soon be available.

"Jerusalem" is the story of a revival. In telling it the writer presents a picture of universal human nature swaying between the poles of warm, comfortable, conventional, and time-honored bodily ease, sanctioned by tradition, and the chill, self-denying, fanatical, disturbing demand of the spirit, setting father against son, wife against husband. The story, to be sure, is intensely local. These Swedish farmers and blacksmiths and school teachers and parsons are not simply of the country, they are the products of generation after generation growing up and dying side by side in one small valley. We see more than one of these generations, trace the likeness between father and son, feel the strength of family inheritance, the power of local tradition. It is all a close, true study of a small group, with its little comedies, its bitter tragedies, its love stories, its tension between members of families or neighbors held together or strained apart by early, casual occurrences long since become rigid rules and traditions. Here they are, these Ingmars and Halvors and Elofs and Helgums, plucked living from their immemorial farms and huts, and set in the mesh of the story; so real, so individual, man, woman, and child, that they touch every one in the world. The Volapük of human emotion is spoken through them, and every human being understands and sympathizes.

There are strange happenings in the course of the story, for the author sets down what strikes upon her characters in the way it appears to them. To Ingmar and Gertrude and the rest in the hut in the forest the forest storm has supernatural causes and phenomena. So we hear with them the voice of the Dog of the Mountain, and the trampling of dark hosts of ruin whose power is as swift and cruel over the soul of man as the trees of the wood. When Brita determines to hang herself we do not look on at her reasons and actions, but we are Brita, thinking her simple and sufficient thoughts and doing what has to be done. And when the stranger enters and looks upon her, and leaves her to peace, we see and apprehend him as she does, not as we, watching her and him, might do if we were experiencing the occurrence at second hand. In this power of completely identifying herself and her reader with her characters Miss Lagerlöf's genius reaches its heights; and it seems futile to employ another word in speaking of her.

The exquisite art of the book is only completely revealed when you have finished and are looking back upon it. The solid foundation of character and habit, the settled ways of these people, with their flashes of idealism, their courage of conviction—these are made familiar and understandable as they would be if you had grown up in Dalecarlia yourself. Then, working on that idealism, that courage, the gradual invasion of religious upheaval, the oversetting of ancient rules and beliefs, the dawning of new demands and needs, the rise of a spiritual enthusiasm powerful enough to sweep the home-loving, tradition-sworn creatures away from their green farms and ancient houses to the desperate hazards of a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, there to set up a colony that was to exemplify the teachings of Christ anew to a world that had drifted far—how clearly, how wonderfully it is all done, while all the while you seem simply to be following the village happenings and personal problems of a few rather slow-thinking, earnest, sincere folk, who believe in walking in the ways of God, but who are not averse from feathering the nest of life.

The description of the final exodus is rarely beautiful. Only an incident here, another there, a face, a figure, an isolated experience or two, are related. But when all are gathered together you realize that every emotion which must have moved the pilgrims, and also those left behind, has been illuminated. It is all there.

A word must be said for the translation, made by a Swedish woman, but one to whom the English language is utterly familiar. It is not only her masterly use and comprehension of our tongue that is evident in the book, as it is in her other translations of Miss Lagerlöf, but the way in which she has grasped the very essence and spirit of the work. The author shines through the work of the translator as she might be seen through a pane of clear glass.

DEAR ENEMY

DEAR ENEMY. By Jean Webster. Illustrated by the author. New York: The Century Company. $1.30.

IT is almost too bad that the readers of "Daddy-Long-Legs" are so well acquainted with Sallie McBride. For any mistaken idea that "Dear Enemy" is a sequel to Miss Webster's earlier story must be dispelled at once. It is a sequel only in carrying out the charm of the other volume, its sweetness, its gay modernity, its humor, and its philosophy. "Dear Enemy" is a bright and winsome tale, full of laughter and originality and common sense.

For in this, as in her other story about an orphan asylum, the author builds her superstructure of light and entertaining fiction upon a foundation of a real social philosophy. The story of Sallie McBride's reforms at the John Grier Home is a pretty and often a very funny bit of romance. But it is also a story of a modern orphan asylum and its needs, a story of fresh air and exercise and garden plots and table manners, of the effort to develop individuality in the best possible way, instead of striving to produce a model "obedient child." The real achievement of Miss Webster in this book, as in the other, is her combination of serious social modernity with the other modernity of gayety and humor, so that both are alive and convincing, and neither loses a jot.

"Dear Enemy"—which we prefer to review as what it is, a separate story, unhampered by mention of "Daddy-Long-Legs" in incident or in celebrity—tells the tale of how Sallie McBride, a charming and presumably frivolous young woman whose sheltered and luxurious background has been all of college and family and social diversions, comes to be superintendent of the John Grier Home, and how she makes it over. Granted both money and authority, the inexperienced Sallie sets to work to give the one hundred and thirteen orphans of the institution just exactly what she herself has had—the best of care and a beautiful time. And just because she is gay and sweet and untrammeled by institution traditions, Sallie breaks down the institution ideal. She opens the nursery windows o' nights. She installs bathtubs and does away with the setting apart of Saturday for special ablutions. She imports other bright and uninstitutional college folk to be aids in her asylum's management, and she alternately cajoles and argues with recalcitrant trustees and would-be adopters who want golden-haired little girls with Mayflower an-sectors. She does a hundred and one radical and astounding things—and she works on the radical and astounding basis of treating her charges as individuals, and interesting individuals at that.

Of course, a book of this sort, written solemnly as a "novel with a purpose," might be merely earnest and conscientious and thoroughly frightening to the reader of fiction. And, of course, Miss Webster's book is never any of those things. From beginning to end it is so human, so full of individual bits of humor and of pathos, so light and charming in its style, that its very real "moral" is never once given a chance to obtrude itself. "Dear Enemy" is a story, and a good one. Its form—that of very personal letters from the superintendent to a few fellow-workers and friends—is always intimate and sometimes fascinatingly inconsequent. There is nothing dour about Sallie McBride. She is no self-denying worshipper of duty. She is having a glorious time!

The book does not have a very coherent development of plot, but it boasts a pretty love story. Whether or not it is all quite "impossible" we do not presume to say. That it is a delightful little story, with a sane philosophy, we know.

Sallie McBride's illustrations for her letters—which are Jean Webster's illustrations for her book—are alluringly absurd. They are altogether laughable and very graphic, and their cleverness adds much to the book's charm.

OLD DELABOLE

OLD DELABOLE. By Eden Phillpotts. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

MR. PHILLPOTTS has dedicated his new novel to Thomas Hardy, who may well esteem this an honor, though the serene and kindly spirit of the book is very unlike the spirit of protest in his own novels. In "Old Delabole" Mr. Phillpotts has spared us the tragic ending that figured so frequently in the Dartmoor novels, and has made a quiet, cheery, deeply human, wholly natural story of village life. As a comedy it is more nearly akin to "Widecombe Fair" than to "The Secret Woman" or "Demeter's Daughter," but in its high idealism at the close it reminds one of his masterpiece, "The Mother."

Just as "Brunel's Tower" was a human drama of the Devon potteries, so "Old Delabole" depicts life in the slate quarries of Cornwall. Delabole is a real village, near Padstow and Tintagel, on the bleak north shore, swept naked of trees by Atlantic storms, but peopled by warm-hearted and deeply conscientious men and women. The great quarry, with its peril from a cliff that is about to fall, dominates the community. When Mr. Phillpotts, as usual, went to live for months among these good Methodist villagers, he found not only a fine variety of likable characters, but also a moral and religious atmosphere, which he has faithfully embodied in his story.

The main theme is simple—the love of two good men for one worthy young woman—but to the last page you will not know whether Edith Retallack is going to marry Wesley Bake or Thomas Hawkey. No harrowing tragedy is brewing, yet complications thicken, and one grows deeply interested to see whether Wesley can hold Edith's love, knowing so little of woman's nature, so seldom able to guess what Edith wants without her asking. On the other hand, the love and love of slate is in the blood of Tom Hawkey, the quarry manager, yet he moves through the scenes of the novel with a growing nobility that fascinates Edith and makes him one of the finest characters Mr. Phillpotts has ever created. In the end a difficult question of conscience shatters a long-standing betrothal and makes the two men rivals for the palm of moral heroism. Rarely has Mr. Phillpotts ended a novel with so fine an emotion.

But the real charm of "Old Delabole" is in its many and diverse characters. Edith's grandfather, Mr. Nute, ought to be enough in himself to make the fortune of the book. A chirrupy, spry old man he is, full of shrewd kindliness, ready at all times to play on his flute or on a religious text with equal skill; moralising in and out of season, getting many a rebuff for his pains, but always imperturbable; in short, "a strenuous old dear," as the women-folk admit, with a smile and a sigh. When he gets up before dawn on Christmas morning, wakes the indignant household with his flute, and is driven outdoors, he cheerfully goes and plays "Christians, Awake!" to the pigs in the sty, who stand in the empty trough and grunt their approval. And when he is left penniless at last, does he worry? Not he! The Lord will provide—and does—in amusing fashion. Yes, Grandfather Nute is a joy.

Wilberforce Retallack is another well-drawn character, with his secret vanity for appearing rich, his foolish charities, and the far-reaching troubles that fall upon his family after his will is read. Then there are his daughters, Edith and Julitta, and his sons, Pooley and Edward, all widely different, and with widely different love affairs. Moses Bunt, always saying cynical, biting things, is another type, while saucy little Betty and demure little Mary strike other notes in the human gamut; again there is Antipas Keat, the baker, whose self-conceit takes the form of trying to build a whole house himself. Mr. Phillpotts is never weary of depicting the humor of egotism.

Most of us would have been willing to do with fewer religious discussions, or to forego this or that minor feature, but the total impression left by "Old Delabole" is singularly pleasing and satisfying. Besides being a good story, richly peopled, and brimful of human nature in its finer aspects, the book is seasoned with quiet humor and a deal of mellow wisdom.

THE PASSPORT

THE PASSPORT. By Emile Voûte. New York: Mitchell Kennerley.

PAINLESS war being the theme of Mr. Voûte's naïvely ingenious novel, "The Passport," one would take him, at first blush, for a dentist. As a matter of fact, his wonderful power of extraction without pain is derived from his long experience as a "ship news" reporter in this city, where he has drawn out the wisdom teeth of the world's truly great at close range and left them smiling and happy.

This accounts for the free and easy method in which his characters salute royalty. For instance, when Richard Warden, the hero, sternly reproves the German Kaiser, he addresses him as "Mr. Emperor," just as one of those eagles of the harbor belonging to Mr. Voûte's profession would say, "Duke, what do you think of America?"

The novel derives its title from the circumstance that the hero, Richard Warden, a young and also wholesome American chemist on his way to Europe in a liner, makes a wager with five millionaires of this country that he can proceed through the lines of the European armies now at war without his passport. As a guarantee of good faith he immediately burns up that important document in the smoking room and in the presence of Mr. Quabb, the Steel King, and other magnates of industry under thin disguises.

The real object of the visit of Mr. Warden to the danger zones is to end the war, and his solution of the difficulty is so simple that one wonders why nobody ever thought of it before. In a publicity note this method has been referred to as "gruesome," which certainly is not the adjective to apply to it. If this question as to characterization had not been raised the public might be left to follow the steps of the diverting tale without getting any advance inklings. Mr. Warden is a chemist and he has invented a wonderful vapor which when released by the shattering of small brown vials which he has in every pocket and in his Gladstone bag, along with his military hair brushes, immediately puts everybody in the neighborhood into a restful sleep. The inventor, before releasing this sweet solace of slumber, puts on a mask. He first tried the agent on his father's cows and then on an I. W. W. mass-meeting, and finally on the band of German workmen who were busy in an undersea workshop for the repair of submarines at Sandy Hook. Emboldened by his success he starts across the ocean on his painless mission. The Autania, on which he is a passenger, is hailed by a U boat, an officer comes on board to give notice that forty minutes are allowed for the disembarkation of the passengers. As he turns to go young Warden, who is in the secrets of the German propaganda in this country, whispers a request in choice Prussian to be taken aboard the submarine.

Once on the deck of the slim terror of the deep, the bold American whips out his bottle and his mask, asphyxiates the Lieutenant and at the same time deftly pitches an ampoule of his wonderful mixture into an access hatch of the submarine and puts every man Jack on board out of commission. This accounts for the towing of one captured submarine of Germany into an English port. The powers of the vapor wear off in four hours and the only effect of it is a slight dizzy feeling resembling katzenjammer.

The fame of this exploit spreads through the War Offices of the powers, and Warden without difficulty makes his way through the lines and arrives at last in the august presence of Wilhelm II., Rex et Imperator. Meanwhile, knowing how perilous is his mis-

By Karl Federn

A lucid presentation of the underlying causes of the European conflict and its meaning to the nations involved. By documents and other recently discovered evidence, Mr. Federn makes out his brief—that England, scenting danger to her own prosperity in the development of German science and inventive genius, sought by the aid of alliances with France and Russia to crowd Germany out of the markets of the world. The result of this policy, furthered by ambitious politicians, resulted in this war, disastrous to this isolation program. Written dispassionately, this book aims to disseminate a correct idea of the origin of this titanic struggle.

THE TRAGEDY OF BELGIUM

By Richard Grasshoff

A clear statement of facts concerning the alleged atrocities of German soldiers in Belgium, giving for the first time in popular form reports and documents refuting absolutely the charges spread through the press of the world by British and Belgian interests. Deceived by the government, the controlled Belgian press inflamed the ignorant populace to franctireur barbarities which compelled the German Army to take stern measures to protect its line of march. The creation of the Belgian Investigation Commission, within three days after hostilities began, set a premium upon the discovery and reporting of such activities, and the skilful coloring and publication of such instigated reports became a formidable instrument in the war policy of England. This compact narrative of what actually occurred constitutes one of the most astounding revelations of the hour, and is bound to work tremendous changes in the world's judgment of the events immediately following the outbreak of the war.

FROM WHITE SEA TO SIBERIAN STEPPE

An Important Book of Travel by Alan Lethbridge in Which a Glimpse Is Given of "The New Russia"

THE NEW RUSSIA: FROM THE WHITE SEA TO THE SIBERIAN STEPPE. By Alan Lethbridge. With ninety-five illustrations from photographs by the author, and three maps. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $3.

MR. LETHBRIDGE'S book lays claim to our interest from three distinct vantage points. It is the record of travels and observations in land hitherto unvisited by any save Russians themselves. It offers an alluring forecast of future national and commercial developments in what we have inaccurately known as "the frozen North" of European and Asiatic Russia. And it presents "the other side" of the general Russian picture; it is gay instead of gloomy, full of kindly comments, from beginning to end generous of praise.

The author, with his wife, began his travels through the unknown north of Russia, eastward toward Siberia, in the early Summer of 1914. They were in Siberia itself when war broke out—their long journey of investigation practically at an end. Thus the trip itself, in the gathering of information about the strange forbidding "wastes" of Russia, had accomplished its object, and there remained only the experience of seeing two curious and interesting things—the mobilization of Russian troops thousands of miles from the centres of national life, and the empire-wide closing of the vodka shops. Mr. Lethbridge has little to say of Russia that is hasty, or even critical. He draws a new and gentle picture of the condition of the peasants, of the existence of the Jews, of the attitude of the Government toward its subjects. His book is full of pleasing snapshots of Russian people and customs and of Russian character. He believes Russia to be "the land of the future," and he believes that in the present war there lies the real "making" of Russian national life and opportunity.

The author of this newest book on Russia has not written of the Southern Provinces or the cities of the Empire, of Petrograd or Moscow or Kief, of Poland or Finland. His travels took him only out of the haunts of cosmopolitan life, international knowledge and urban habit into the Russia that only Russians know. It is in this determination to acquaint himself with the people of the unknown Russia that he makes most interesting his love of the country. That Mr. Lethbridge does truly love Russia there is no possibility of doubt. And now that the war has put an end forever, he points out, to the Government monopoly on vodka, and closed, even temporarily, the vodka shops, there is no limit to the hopes that one may legitimately build for the future of Russia—its people's happiness and its national development and wealth.

The value of the war to Russia lies primarily, Mr. Lethbridge remarks, in three things—the closing of the vodka monopoly, the growth of a better understanding between Czar and moujik, and the waking up of Russia herself to her commercial possibilities—the need for railroads, the drilling of many, many kinds of mines, the control of the fur industry, the use of the forests. "This portion of Russia," he writes of the great sweep of the north, "is so strong, so clean, and so unspoiled that with the most ordinary good-will it can be easily molded into a great 'new world' where, if the wind blows strong and cold it is ever tempered by the warmth and friendliness of its people. But there is a greater and more serious aspect connected with this question of what I call the 'neglected north.' The war has done many things for Russia"—the author recounts some of the benefits just mentioned—"it has knit the various races of this great country into a solid and united whole and it has lessened religious bigotry and sectarian bitterness. And it will have done yet another good work in reminding the Russian Government of its overlooked assets, those pigeonholed provinces which have no place in the lasting sun of official favor, but which, if once liberally encouraged, would become yet one more support to the mighty fabric in which all who love Russia so confidently believe—the Russian Empire." Of the benefits already accruing to the nation and its people from the ending of the vodka monopoly and the prohibition of its sale Mr. Lethbridge quotes the effect on the peasants' savings banks. "M. Bark, the Russian Minister for Finance," he says, "proved that from the date of the prohibition of the sale of vodka to the beginning of 1915—a space of only four months—the deposits in these banks exceeded the grand total of the preceding year many times over." Again and again in his book Mr. Lethbridge shows, in his sketches of the courteous, kindly, sweet-natured peasant of the north, his conviction that it is not Government oppression nor national incapacity that has stood in the way of the Russian's advance, but—more than anything else could—vodka. And now, he is sure, a better day has dawned.

In the condition of the Jews of the north, too, the author sees a brighter picture than that to which we have become accustomed in reports from Southern Russia. He says: "Russia is a vast country, and at times her treatment of Jewry has come under the fire of severe criticism. Equally, those comprising Jewry form a vast and complex race. By and large, the Jews outside the Pale in the Russian Empire are not so dissatisfied as Russia's enemies would like to believe. The worst epithet I ever heard applied by such a Jew to Russian officialdom was that its officers were ofttimes 'grubl,' which may be translated 'rough.' And also certain is it that they prefer to be under Russian rule rather than to be forced to submit to any foreign domination, particularly German. The Jews in Russia who have emancipated themselves and have long left the Pale may regret Russian action. They may totally and entirely disagree with it. Yet withal they have a sincere affection for the 'Russian land,' and they are prepared to show it by any means in their power. Those who have lived in Warsaw," the author adds, "will allow that the Warsaw Jew is a person apart."

The condition of the agricultural laborer in Russia, the writer believes, compares fairly well with that of the English laborer of the same class. And Mr. Lethbridge has the utmost scorn and condemnation for the "agitators" whose "destructive policy" stirs up Russian discontent.

The author emphasizes with many facts and figures the opportunity for Russian development and British commerce in these "neglected" provinces, and points out that Germany has been far from "neglectful" of her possibilities in what is now her enemy's land. But for the average American reader both these commercial promises and the writer's praise of all things Russian are really far less interesting than the general and impartial descriptions of the Russian people and of the civilization of Siberia, the Urals, Archangel, and the "Great Russia" of the European North. The chronicle of the author's adventures in Archangel, the fascinating ten-picture of the monks and the monastery of Solovets, the bits of history, the recounting of quaint customs—these are full of strangeness and charm. And the author has done well in combining so skilfully his appeal to British commercial interest and his promise of Russia's future with such picturesque and interesting bits of character-study and national lore.

As all good writers should, Stephen Leacock follows up his last book with a better one. "Moonbeams from the Larger Lunacy" is by far the best work he has done. While the humor is as droll as that of the "Nonsense Novels" or "Behind the Beyond," it is more subtle and satisfying.

He has filled the novel with splendid touches that show men and women clear to their souls and their bones."—Philadelphia Record.

BEHIND THE SCENES AT THE FRONT

George Adam Gives Typical Sketches from His Experiences in France — "The Partitions of Poland," and Other Books on the War

BEHIND THE SCENES AT THE FRONT. By George Adam, Paris correspondent of The London Times. With a frontispiece. New York: Duffield & Co.

MR. ADAM does two things in his book: He describes the chaotic political conditions in France on the eve of the war, and he pictures the daily life of the soldiers at the front. With him the reader may visit the trenches around Ypres, where the German flood was stayed last November in a three weeks' battle that left more than 40,000 German corpses on the field and caused a total German loss of at least 150,000 men. British and German soldiers have held the city ever since, but it is a city ruined and desolate, with the wonderful Cloth Hall destroyed beyond repair by German shells.

Not the least interesting of Mr. Adam's chapters is the one in which he tells how Tommy Atkins is kept fit for the strain of trench warfare. For one thing, he is better fed than ever before. Every day he is expected to consume a pound and a quarter of fresh meat, the same amount of bread, four ounces of bacon, three of cheese, from two to eight of vegetables, three of sugar, a quarter of a pound of jam, with tea, salt, pepper, mustard, two ounces of butter twice a week, and a liberal allowance of tobacco. The meat for the English Army is all frozen. The only slaughtering of beef within the lines is done for the men from India, whose meat has to be killed in accordance with caste ritual. Their flour for chupatties has to be brought from India, but they have taken kindly to jam and consume great quantities of it.

The health of all the men, so long as they escape wounds, is better than at home. They fight like heroes and they are treated like heroes. The most remarkable progress has been made in prevention of disease. Not only are the men inoculated against typhoid, cholera, smallpox, and tetanus, but the most rigid care is taken to watch the water supply and the sewage disposal. Similar attention is given to the nerves and spirits of the men. What would the old line officers of Wellington's day have thought of giving a whole army hot baths every fortnight under fire, of administering the rest cure, and even furnishing chiropodists, barbers, and mouth organs? All this is now done with good results. Every moment the men are out of the trenches is devoted to restoring the tremendous wastage caused by the strain of shell fire.

'A large jute factory near Ypres has been fitted up as a rest home, accommodating 1,000 exhausted trench fighters at a time. There are baths, dormitories, reading room, dining hall, tailor shop, and other accessories. The author says:

> It is an object lesson in efficiency to watch the different stages of the men's progress from mud-caked figures until they become once more the smart soldiers of the recruiting posters. They undress in a room which is isolated from the rest of the establishment, and, leaving their clothes behind them, they dash into the factory to a platform; then, with many manifestations of delight, fourteen at a time they plunge into the huge bleaching vats. * * * With much rubbing and some Swedish exercise, they regain the elasticity of limb lost in the trenches. Then they file through the storeroom, receiving an equipment which has been cleansed from top to bottom.
> Their discarded clothes meanwhile have been put through the great Tresh disinfecting machine. In an adjoining room a hundred refugee Belgian women have been washing their underclothing with every type of improved laundry apparatus. * * * One of the most curious sights to be seen in the field is that of long lines of factory girls, used to handling jute, waiting outside the factory door for the sound of the whistle calling them to their spell of duty in cleaning the British soldier.

In like manner Mr. Adam describes the life of the French soldiers in the Valley of the Meuse, in the curious villages they have built back of the trenches. Some of these consist of cabins made from wreckage, others of clay wigwams, still others of caves where they at least make a joking pretense of enjoying all the comforts of home. Such are the more cheerful aspects of the picture.

There are other aspects, grim and terrible, as in the chapter where the author describes the ruined towns he has visited in France. He relates various episodes indicating that the Germans are patiently laboring to sow distrust of the British in the minds of the French people. The propagandist bureau is busy, he says, and he forewarns his countrymen to discount in advance the German plea, which will surely be made at the peace conference, that severity to Germany would destroy the great buffer between England and the Slav horde.

UNHAPPY POLAND

THE PARTITIONS OF POLAND. By Lord Eversley. With six illustrations and four maps. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co.

LORD EVERSLEY has performed a timely service in writing this compact, critical history of the dismemberment of Poland. In clear, direct, flawless English, without a superfluous word, he tells the story of Poland's downfall from the first covetous moves of Frederick the Great to the present time, when all three aggressors are posing in white sheets before the world and making fine promises to Poland in case of victory.

Carlyle, excusing the conduct of Frederick, contended that the ruin of the Polish Nation was God's punishment for its crimes and anarchy. Lord Eversley, writing in a more modern spirit, finds that the internal weakness of Poland was due to "the most vicious Constitution that has ever been devised by man." This Constitution made the King an elective puppet in the hands of the so-called nobles, who ruled through the Diet. No law could be passed by the Diet without a unanimous vote. A single member could defeat the wisest measure merely by rising and saying, "I do not consent." This in itself was enough to paralyze the Government, and other glaring faults helped in the same direction.

In that hour of weakness Poland had the misfortune to have two powerful and aggressive sovereigns as neighbors. Lord Eversley is convinced that the initiative for the partition of 1772 came from Frederick the Great of Prussia, but he admits that the Empress Catherine of Russia was an able second, and the more relentless schemer of the two. It was Catherine who actively prevented the success of a reformed Constitution by both secret and openly armed interference at Warsaw. Maria Theresa of Austria opposed the crime, but took her share of the plunder.

Rapidly the author sketches the events of the second and third partitions, which finished the existence of Poland as a nation in 1793-95. He brings out the curious fact that the death of Poland probably saved the life of France. Austria and Prussia had set out to crush the French Revolution, but their mutual jealousies regarding Poland, skillfully played off against each other by Catherine, caused the failure of their expedition. The whole story of greed and intrigue is one of the most disgraceful in history. Lord Eversley gives the palm for diplomatic skill to Catherine, and that for repeated treachery to Frederick William, who accepted money from England to fight the French revolutionists, and used it to dismember Poland. In the end the author makes this generous distribution of honors:

> In apportioning the blame for the crime we are justified in the conclusion that the conduct of Prussia was the most perfidious and mendacious, that of Russia the most cunning and deadly, and that of Austria the most mean and treacherous.

Lord Eversley believes that Prussia and Austria did a very unwise thing, even from the point of view of self-interest, when they helped to destroy the buffer State that lay between them and Russia. He examines the fortunes of the Poles under the three Governments, and finds that Prussia has been their worst oppressor. His sympathies at present are with Russia, but he contents himself with expressing the hope that the congress which brings the present war to a close will not repeat the mistake of the Congress of Vienna by refusing Poland an assured nationality.

ITALY BEFORE THE WAR

EN ITALIA AVANT LA GUERRE. Par Jules Destrée. Preface de Maurice Maeterlinck. Bruxelles et Paris: G. Van Oest et Cie.

L'ALLEMAGNE AVANT LA GUERRE. Par Baron Beyens. Bruxelles et Paris: G. Van Oest et Cie.

BOTH of these French books are by prominent Belgians. Jules Destrée was a Socialist Deputy from Charleroi. Driven into exile by the German invasion, he and his fellow-Deputy, Georges Lorand, went to Italy and began a remarkable campaign to arouse that nation to arms. Maurice Maeterlinck, the poet and essayist, took part in the work and was greeted everywhere by eager crowds, but in his luminous preface to M. Destrée's book he says little about himself and much about the magic power that Destrée wielded over Italian audiences. Having been a student at Bologna in his youth, he spoke the language with full command of every idiom, and Maeterlinck is convinced that the six months' agitation by Destrée and Lorand, extending from Venice and Rome to the remotest cities of Sicily, was a powerful element in causing Italy to enter the war on the side of the Allies.

Maeterlinck himself found need of all his tact to avoid offending the quick Italian temperament, but Destrée, fitting his words to the temper of each audience, had a way of gliding insensibly from a comparison of Flemish and Italian art to the wrongs of Flanders and the outrages committed by the Germans, so that he carried his hearers with him and was permitted to say everything that was in his heart.

In this book M. Destrée tells the story of his experiences in Italy, with glances at art and architecture, but with an eye mainly to men. There are interviews and character sketches, especially of Italian Socialists—Mussolini, Raymondo, and many others. The author speaks with admiration of the fiery eloquence of d'Annunzio in the anxious days just before Italy decided to declare war.

Baron Beyens was the Belgian Minister at Berlin when the war broke out, and his book is devoted to men and conditions in Germany as he saw them. He gives much space to the Kaiser and various members of the royal family, to political parties, and to the diplomatic events of the "tragic week."

After weighing the evidence, Baron Beyens believes that the ultimatum to Serbia was "imagined in Berlin and executed in Vienna." The German Emperor and his military advisers deliberately decided to profit by a situation which they had long awaited, and which might never come again. The author recalls the fact that at the time of the Agadir incident the German Steel Syndicate petitioned the Chancellor to make war on France, and other industrial leaders clamored for the annexation of Belgium; but the Kaiser's chief motive for war, he believes, was political rather than economic.

FOR FRENCH-CANADIANS

A fine example of what is being done to educate the people of French descent in Canada as to the causes of the war has made its appearance in pamphlet form from the pen of the veteran Quebec journalist, Ulric Bath, ("Devant le grand jury des nations," par un ancien journaliste, Quebec, publié par l'auteur. 15 cents.)

It is a keen and logical analysis in the light of the various White Papers, the Red Books, the Yellow Book, and the Orange Book of the diplomacy which forced the great war on Europe—the Austro-Hungarian rejection of Serbia's reply to the ultimatum of July 23, 1914, Germany's insistence that the matter was a question between Austria and Serbia alone, Russia's determination to defend Serbia if attacked or to submit the matter to arbitration, and the efforts of England and France to demonstrate to Germany that the Austro-Serbian quarrel was not a local matter, since Russia was concerned, but one for adjustment by the Chancelleries of the powers.

All the "papers" and "books" concerned are given in condensed form, with an admirable system of cross references which at once makes accessible to the reader all the material dealing with a given point in the great debate.

An illuminating feature of the introduction is the "deadly parallel" between the facts in the case and their proof, as shown by diplomatic documents, confirming beyond any doubt that Germany had prepared for war, desired war, and had used the Austro-Serbian question to make war inevitable.

IMPORTANT BOOKS IN SHORT REVIEWS

A Practical Work by Frank A. Parsons on Decorative Ideals, and Other Publications of Interest to the General Reader

INTERIOR DECORATION: Its Principles and Practice. By Frank Alvah Parsons, B. S., President of the New York School of Fine and Applied Art. Illustrated. New York: Doubleday, Page & Co. $3.

THIS work, written by a recognized authority on the subject of which it treats, may be summed up as a standard book of information for the general public. It is exceedingly simple in its explanations and its statements of basic principle. It is, furthermore, exceedingly strict in its emphasis on the need for better decorative ideals in American homes. It has much to say of the fundamental theories of interior decoration, and it enters with some detail into the definition and history of the various "periods" of decorative and other art. Moreover, it hints of the evolution of American decorative principle in the future. And from cover to cover it is a book, not for the decorator or the artist, but for the householder himself.

Mr. Parsons goes on the cheering assumption that 95 per cent. of the Americans who "use a house" are really "artists"; this is in the sense of appreciating beauty and ability to group beautiful things together. That a large proportion of that same 95 per cent. is in need of information on the mere principles of decorating is, as an equal assumption, inherent in Mr. Parsons's book. But he makes it plain that he considers the possibility of evolving really beautiful homes—whether they are mansions or cottages or city flats—to be after all a simple matter, and that he believes in America's ability to produce a truly fine new "period" of its own.

He begins, therefore, with basic principles. He emphasizes, first of all, the necessity for a structural purpose in decoration as in building. On this foundation of structural use all decoration must be arranged, and Mr. Parsons is quick to point out in his introduction the vast difference between "decorating" and "ornamenting" a house. He is severe on "ornamentation." His first plea is to get rid of ugly things—no matter how old they may be or how closely interwoven with family sentiment. He begins with a thoroughgoing process of elimination as a basic need. And then he goes on to explain the principles of color, the values of different colors, their decorative influence, their relation to the "decorative idea"; of form and their relation to housemaking; of balance and movement; of emphasis; of unity; and then, in detail, of the uses of various textures, of scales and motifs. He goes into the vexing "little things" of modern house decoration—how to frame pictures and how to hang them, how to arrange curtains, the various methods of lighting the modern house, the choice and placing of furniture and "decorative objects" alike. He cites the principle which should govern the arrangement of the house down to very small details.

About half of the book is taken up with these simple and valuable pieces of general and specific instruction. As we have pointed out, "Interior Decoration" is a volume for the average householder—the man or woman who wants a beautiful place to live in (whether with large or small expenditure) and who wants to learn the principles on which a living place may be made beautiful. It is an informative work that may well be called a general textbook of decoration—a textbook for the man who wants to beautify his own house.

The other half of the book takes up the famous "periods." After an introductory chapter on the ideas of the periods, Mr. Parsons offers his readers simple and interesting information as to what the "periods" have been. For, he says, they "have been treated as strange and incomprehensible, too deep and mysterious for anything but unquestioning admiration and slavish copy." He makes clear their essential qualities.

In America, Mr. Parsons concludes, we are entering upon a "new Renaissance." After sketching the history of our Colonial decoration, our black walnut period, our craze for French styles, our adoption of the English manner, he adds this interesting touch of prophecy: "At present we are entering upon a new era in this country. Neither the French styles nor the English express exactly what the most refined and educated person in any walk of life desires to express in his living room, bedroom, dining room, or library. A strong tendency is apparent to return to the first principles of the Italian Renaissance. In them are found certain structural and decorative facts which are fundamental in all periods which have followed. The thoughtful student must analyze this Italian Renaissance, and he will find that the Classic, the Christian, and the Humanistic influences must be separately considered in order to form any estimate of its meaning. The coming period in American art will be one in which the intellect and the feelings of a cultivated people with limitless resources will both assert themselves in the expression of the modern house. No period will be copied in its entirety. Each period will be studied."

"Interior Decoration" is very beautifully illustrated with pictures and "elevations" of various kinds of rooms. It gives promise of being a most valuable volume of its kind.

JANE CLEGG

JANE CLEGG. A play in three acts, by St. John Ervine. New York: Henry Holt & Co. Price 50 cents.

SIMPLE, skillful, sincere, observant, human, calm, and quite dismal, "Jane Clegg" is an interesting sample of the modern school of naturalistic English drama. It is a new three-act play by St. John Ervine, the first of his to be published in this country. Originally it was produced more than two years ago at the Gaiety Theatre in Manchester by the admirable repertory company there resident. Jane Clegg is the idealistic, unsentimental, spiritually rather gaunt wife of a weak, soft-moraled London clerk of whom she quietly disposes when her own economic independence makes the course possible.

Sure-footed and respectful, Mr. Ervine follows in the path blazed by Galsworthy and Barker. They have led the rebellion against the false romance and hollow theatricalism of a passing day. They have striven for what they like to call the normal drama. It is their disciples who sometimes achieve what might be called a subnormal drama. There are traces of this under-nourished condition in the ascetic work of this playwright, whose contribution to the contemporary theatre is assignable, of course, to the Manchester group. It is interesting that that city should have given its name to a succession of plays wherein you feel constantly as background the oppressive presence of the English industrialism now undergoing so fearful a strain—a sort of permanent intellectual backdrop which accounts naturally for the fact that on all their theatrical properties—if you run your finger over them—you find not dust nor grit, but a thin layer of gray soot.

WALES

WALES: HER ORIGINS, STRUGGLES, AND LATER HISTORY, INSTITUTIONS, AND MANNERS. By Gilbert Stone. With an introduction by the Right Honorable Ellis J. Griffith, K. C., M. P. Great Nations Series. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.50.

IN his complete and scholarly study of the history of Wales Mr. Stone's main effort is to bring into view the notable features of Welsh nationalism and to exhibit their sources. We are asked to consider the Welsh of the present day, notwithstanding their relations to the United Kingdom and the British Empire, a distinct people—in other words to accept the view that the nationalism of Wales has survived her absorption into the United Kingdom. Touching on this point in the introduction he contributes to Mr. Stone's work the Right Hon. Ellis J. Griffith remarks:

> Any person not of the country itself but coming into Wales from the outside is immediately conscious of the fact that he has entered a strange country. It may well be that he has come into a district which, like Ireland, speaks the English language; still none the less will he feel that the people are in some strange and subtle way in permanent contrast with the English people themselves. It would be difficult to define the difference in any detail; most people would be content to say it was in atmosphere, which means little or nothing.

But we know the causes which have produced the effect—the different forces which have been at work in molding the character of the people of the Principality; they have believed and worked for things of their own; they have lived and died for their own distinct ideals; their memories are different, and so, to a large extent, are their dreams and their hopes; and he who comes to them from other lands and other peoples immediately becomes aware of this independence of soul, if not of political organization.

It may help to an understanding of this survival of Welsh nationalism if we consider the case of Belgium. It is quite improbable that Belgium will be permanently absorbed by Germany. But if the absorption should take place, and there should be no considerable colonization of Germans in that country, the Belgians would continue indubitably a separate and independent people in respect to their sentiments and their aspirations; their nationalism would not have been destroyed by their political subjugation.

It can hardly be said, however, that if Belgium's future should turn out according to this hypothesis, the future historian would find in her nationalism a field as interesting as that afforded in Wales. The Welsh have an unusually interesting national history; no people in Europe has an older history nor a history that appeals more strongly to the intelligent men and women of today. Mr. Stone seems to have succeeded admirably in his study of this ancient and honorable people.

SCOUT LAW IN PRACTICE

THE SCOUT LAW IN PRACTICE. By Arthur A. Carey. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. $1 net.

Although Mr. Carey's handy volume is intended especially for the use of Boy Scout leaders, making for their benefit an exposition of the Scout oath and law, the book might very well find a place close to the hand of every parent and every teacher. For it could not fail to stimulate them to fresh effort in that character training which is so largely in their hands and to help them much by its practical pointing out of ideas, principles, and methods. The basic idea of the book is insistence upon the obligations of honor whenever the choice lies between it and self-interest. The author makes a very clear, simple, and direct exposition of the ideas of honor and of duty to one's country, showing how, in a way that would appeal to any boy, they can be made the guiding principles of his own life. Other chapters take up the Scout oath and the Scout law, analyzing them and showing how to make practical, everyday application of their principles. A brief foreword is contributed by James E. West, Chief Scout Executive of the Boy Scouts of America.

NEUTRAL RIGHTS AT SEA

THE PROTECTION OF NEUTRAL RIGHTS AT SEA. Documents on the Naval Warfare. Introduction by William R. Shepherd. New York: Sturgis & Walton Company. 25 cents.

In convenient pamphlet form are here gathered together the communications of the American Government to the European Governments and their replies upon matters connected with the rights of the United States, as a neutral nation, at sea. Many of the summaries are taken from the columns of THE NEW YORK TIMES. The documents have been edited and arranged by William R. Shepherd, Professor of History in Columbia University, who writes also an introduction in which he examines judicially the contentions of the several parties to the controversy, showing upon what bases they make their demands and what are the rights of each one. He closes his short but lucid and interesting review with a few sentences calling attention to the important position held by the United States in this conflict as the champion of the rights of neutral nations in times of war. He thinks that the United States, if it cannot secure just treatment for neutral nations by its individual protests, should "arrange for the meeting of a congress of such nations to draw up a statement of the principles that justice demands should be observed by the nations at war." It would be within the possibilities of such a congress, he believes, to "put a milestone on the pathway of progress toward universal peace."

Citizens in Industry

A discussion of the labor problem that merits the attention of capitalists, workingmen, and economists appears in a volume entitled "Citizens in Industry," written by the late Professor Charles Richmond Henderson of the University of Chicago a short time before his death. The book contains many practical suggestions for promoting good feeling between employer and employe, and a useful summary of what has been accomplished in various industrial establishments in the way of satisfying aspirations of their working folks. THE YEAR'S BOOKS

WITH half the world in arms, what will happen—what has happened — to literature? Like every other peaceful occupation, the making of books is bound to reflect, in one way or another, the crisis through which civilization is passing. Time enough has elapsed since the memorable outbreak of the war in Europe for those absorbed in the study of such matters to discern and analyze something of the effect of these transforming events upon the intellectual life of the world. Famous authors have made forecasts of the ultimate result of the war to literature. There have been symposiums on the subject, and, as prophecy always offers a pleasing and harmless occupation to those gifted with imagination, we have seen literature made over into shapes fantastic or prosaic, offering a diversity so striking that the mere seeker after information must be perplexed indeed by the contradictions presented to him from eminent authorities. Meanwhile, like everything else that is dependent upon human effort, literature is already undergoing changes directly due to the war. It needs the collector of facts rather than the prophet to interpret the great conflict in terms of books. For the influence of the war on literature has become amply apparent in the changes that have actually taken place in the character of the publications in nearly every department of literature during the last twelve months. From time to time we have noted certain of these developments, but the modifying influences through which literature is passing are so important that a more thoroughgoing and exhaustive survey seems to be necessary. To furnish such an analysis of the year's books to its readers will be the prime object of THE NEW YORK TIMES REVIEW OF BOOKS in its special Holiday Number, to be published on the 28th of November. For years booklovers have been accustomed to rely upon this publication to guide them through the mazes of current literature. This season its practical value in this respect will, it is believed, be greater than ever. Thus an annotated list will be given of 200 leading books of the year, carefully chosen to represent every department of literature; there will be a continuation of THE BOOK REVIEW'S valuable bibliography of the war, bringing the latter up to the 1st of December, and, for the special benefit of holiday book buyers, descriptive articles will be furnished covering the Christmas gift books for young and old. Besides these features there will be authoritative reviews of the year's achievements in such leading departments of literature as history and biography, poetry, fiction, education, &c. In all of these fields the influence of the momentous events through which we are passing is making itself felt, and a record of the changes that are already apparent is of importance in gauging the future course of literature.

THE publication, in revised form, of the "Short History of the English People," by J. R. GREEN, in Everyman's Library is a noteworthy undertaking. During the forty years of its existence—the original edition appeared in 1874—GREEN'S work has held an enviable position among the histories of England. In its methods of presentation it inaugurated a welcome departure from the traditions observed by historians, and in placing the people rather than a long line of Kings in the centre of the stage it was guided by the innovating spirit of democracy. As it will appear in the two-volume Everyman edition, the "Short History" will have the benefit of Mr. L. CECIL JANE'S revision, together with an appendix, by R. P. FARLEY, in which is given a summary of events from the battle of Waterloo to the end of the nineteenth century. History is very much to the fore in these days, and a revised edition of so important a work as this is sure of a welcome. The task of the reviser was undertaken, necessarily, before the outbreak of the war, although its completion must have been reached within the last twelve months. It will be interesting to note how nearly the present conflict will be foreshadowed in Mr. FARLEY'S summary.

ENGLISH critics are devoting more attention than ever before to the literature of Russia. The revived interest may be due to the friendship that has sprung up during the past year between the two nations as a result of the intimacies growing out of allied warfare; or it may be, as one critic declares, on account of a "great artistic and literary revival in the Slav empire." The same critic asserts that "from the signs and portents of the last few years some observers have predicted an Augustan Age" in Russia. Whether or not this estimate is due solely to the enthusiasm of the moment, there is no doubt that translations from the Russian are occupying an increasing place among the season's publications—and it is worth noting, as bearing on the "Augustan Age" view of the matter, that many of these translations are of works of living authors and not merely of those Russian classics that have gone out of print here and in England. In whatever way we regard it, the revival of Russian literature with us is an important feature of the book season and one that shows no sign as yet of having run its course.

IT is difficult to gauge the popularity of fiction that is written in a series of volumes, more or less connected in theme, character, and incident, but we cannot withhold our appreciation of the energy and ambition of the novelist who enters voluntarily upon so laborious a venture as that involved in this method of production. One quails before the mere physical bulk of such trilogies as "Clayhanger" or "Jacob Stahl," but these are as nothing compared to a real fiction series. Perhaps the longest instance of the latter has just been completed by Mr. EDEN PHILLPOTTS in his "Epic of Dartmoor," as an English critic calls it, a series of novels that fill twenty-five volumes. And now that he has successfully turned the corner with this great enterprise — and certainly his Dartmoor stories are in every sense worthy to be called successful—Mr. PHILLPOTTS is starting another series, romances written around England's industries. "Brunel's Tower," the first of these, had the Devonshire potteries for its theme; it is followed this year by "Old Delabole," a tale of the Cornish slate quarries. Mr. PHILLPOTTS has the faculty of always interesting his readers. His characters are vividly drawn, and his plots are well worth the unraveling. His new series ought to result in excellent fiction, as well as a picturesque record of industrial England. Of course, the series idea is not new with novelists. BALZAC'S "Comedie Humaine" furnishes the classic instance of its employment, and the lover of romance will recall with delight the d'Artagnan stories of DUMAS. The character of the series attempted by Mr. PHILLPOTTS, however, is essentially a modern development.

A POET WHOSE POPULARITY IS GROWING

Sympathetic and Scholarly Interpretation of Robert Browning's Works by Professor William Lyon Phelps

BROWNING: HOW TO KNOW HIM. By William Lyon Phelps. With portrait. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $1.50.

IN these days of great emotional stress over the whole world, poetry of all degrees of merit is being constantly written, is constantly seeking a public. Only yesterday men prated sadly of the age of prose, but the war has changed all that. There is still a kind of impatience of contemplative verse. The dreamer by the quiet stream is forgotten. But the clear-voiced singer of brave songs is heard.

So it is not perhaps surprising that in the welter of contemporary verse we can yet turn with interest to a study of Robert Browning, the greatest poet, as some think, of the recent past, the most definitely tonic force in English literature since Shakespeare. Undoubtedly Browning is at present read more widely, more as a matter of course, and with more enjoyment and ease of understanding, than ever before.

To this enjoyment and ease of understanding Professor Phelps has contributed much in this country during his years of teaching, directly to some thousands of young men who have listened to him at Yale, and indirectly through them to a wider circle. His new book brings to those of us who have not had the privilege of hearing him a fresh delight in finding keen judgment, painstaking, but not dull, interpretation, and the ripe wisdom and pleasant humor of the true scholar set to so congenial a task. To his former students the volume must reconstruct for the imagination many hours in the lecture room, hours of new ideas and recognitions of genius.

Professor Phelps has followed a familiar order of presentation—the poet's life, his theory, and his representative writings—in a thoroughly satisfactory way. And he closes the volume with a very interesting and just chapter on Browning's optimism, the quality which he thinks most inclusive in the poet's character and most influential in his work. About sixty poems are given entire, and appear in the text following the explanatory matter, not collected at the end of the book, to be laboriously sought after the interpretation has been read. No apology is made for the omission, at first surprising, of any formal analysis or criticism of the longer poems and dramas; they could hardly be included in a work of this scope. But they are briefly discussed in relation to the poet's life, and frequently referred to in explanation of Browning's theories as expressed in the shorter poems.

Though the book is conventional in plan, however, it is not so in content. What gives it significance is the quality of sympathy in Professor Phelps's writing, sympathy with his subject and with his audience, which makes for what one may call a psychological accuracy of criticism.

"Browning's life," we are told, "was healthy, comfortable, and happy." And again: "No man, little or great, was ever more free from pose." He was "studiously normal." On this pleasant foundation of usualness in circumstance and appearance is built our interest in the man himself, in his intensity of nature, his eager humanity, and the absorbed affection he lavished on all life—art, music, scholarship, romance, religion, personalities of every type, high or low or merely commonplace—no matter what, so long as it was life.

"You must learn Robert," says Mrs. Browning in a letter to Mrs. Jameson, quoted by Profesor Phelps; "he is made of moods—chequered like a chessboard." And the quotation might almost stand as a motto to this book. It brims with Browning's vitality and erudition. He wrote with intention in the objective manner, but we know him by his subjects and his treatment of them, as we learn a man from his conversation. Few are they whose talk fetches so wide a circle.

Sufficient credit for Browning's intellectual attainments is given to the poet's parents, his musically gifted mother and his somewhat astonishing father, the scholarly business man who took time to teach his little son many things in play or work. It seems almost a pity not to have quoted in this first chapter at least the opening lines of "Development," the poet's reminiscent tribute in Asolando:

> My father was a scholar and knew Greek.
> When I was five years old I asked him once,
> "What do you read about?" "The Siege of Troy."
> "What is a siege, and what is Troy?" Whereat
> He piled up chairs and tables for a town,
> Set me a-top for Priam, called our cat
> Helen, enticed away from home, * * *
> This taught me who was who and what was what.

Could anything be more modern? Naturally, at 12 he was reading Homer.

"One of the reasons why his poetry sometimes seems so pedantic," says Professor Phelps with gentle irony, "is because he never realised how ignorant most of us are. * * *" I suppose he did not believe that men could pass years in school and university training and know so little." But we are not allowed to lay the flattering unction to our souls that Browning was a prig. "He was profoundly learned without pedantry and without conceit, and he was primarily a social being." He enjoyed fencing, boxing, riding, and dancing; Elizabeth Barrett is said to have found it "difficult to imagine the author of 'Paracelsus' dancing the polka."

The story of Browning's courtship and marriage is sympathetically and gracefully told. And the poem, "One Word More," is made a part of it, as the most personal thing in his works, directly addressed to the poet-wife who fulfilled for him every ideal and confirmed him as a poet of love.

It is, in fact, in Browning's treatment of love that Professor Phelps finds the most comprehensive expression of his philosophy. The study of "Cristina"—which covers twice as many pages as that of "Rabbi Ben Ezra," and is, perhaps, the best thing in the book—is a good illustration. It points out in this story of a sudden and unrequited love "four of Browning's fundamental articles of faith: the doctrine of the elective affinities; of success through failure; the doctrine that time is measured by the intensity of spiritual experiences; the doctrine that life on earth is a trial and a test the result of which will be seen in the higher and happier development when the soul is freed."

After analyzing the poet's theory of poetry as the chronicle of "the stages of all life," of inspiration as drawn "not from a mountain or the stars, but from all sorts and conditions of men"; after reminding us that "active cerebration on the part of the listener or the reader is essential," Professor Phelps writes thus confidently: "It is interesting to remember that Browning, of all poets most intellectual, should be so predominantly the poet of love. This passion is the motive power of his verse, as he believed it to be the motive power of the universe. It is natural, for love is the essence of force and does not spring from effeminate weakness or febrile delicacy." Browning's rejected lovers are "such splendid fellows," and are compared to Tennyson's peevish heroes, much to the disadvantage of the latter. "Love Among the Ruins," by many considered his masterpiece, shows "the ephemeral nature of civilization and the permanent fact of love." The chapter closes with a comment on "Summum Bonum," "a great and daring lyric":

> In Browning's philosophy * * * Love is the supreme fact, and every manifestation of it on earth, from the Divine Incarnation down to a chance meeting of lovers, is more important than any other event or idea.

This last statement illumines the whole series of religious poems as well, and, taken broadly, makes clear a hundred doubtful passages. But it hardly justifies Professor Phelps's attribution of a religious motive to Porphyria's lover. The lines will be recalled:

> That moment she was mine, mine, fair,
> Perfectly pure and good: I found
> A thing to do * * *

So "if he lets her go, she will surely fall from grace, and become a lost soul. He strangles her with her yellow hair, risking damnation for her salvation."

Is Professor Phelps himself being obscurely figurative or does he mean what he says? In the face of revered authority one feels like the little boy who said his father's "must" made him feel "'won't' all over."

Under the well-chosen heading "Poems of Paradox" Professor Phelps discusses "The Glove" with brisk and charming commentary, and "The Statue and the Bust," that stumbling block of Browning Club moralists, with deep appreciation and a few lines on purpose in life in which one feels the writer's understanding and sympathy for young men. Clive is a glorification of physical courage. It is hard to resist quoting the following fine bit of psychology:

> The courage of soldiers in the mass seems sublime, but it is the commonest thing on earth; all nations show it; it is probably an inexplicable compound of discipline, pride, shame, and rage; but individuals differ from one another as sharply in courage as they do in mental ability. In sheer physical courage Clive has never been surpassed, and Browning, who loved the manly virtues, saw in this corrupt and cruel man a great hero.

It is this emphasis on purpose and courage which makes Browning a tonic and a stimulant. It is his belief in "God and Truth and Love" which makes him an optimist. In his liking for dramatic form we find just his love of humanity expressed in the concrete rather than the abstract. "When Browning is interested in any doctrine or system of thought he creates a person to illustrate it." Sometimes rising to the sublimity of religious exaltation, as in Saul, sometimes groveling as with Caliban, "the absolute and convinced pessimist," who "judges the whole order of the universe from proximate and superficial evidences."

The whole passage on "Caliban Upon Setebos" is both witty and penetrating. But all will not agree with Professor Phelps's view of the original Caliban:

> Shakespeare made the monster for decorative purposes, to satisfy his love of the grotesque, as an architect placed gargoyles on a cathedral; the grotesque is an organic part of romantic art. Browning is interested not in Caliban's appearance, but in his processes of thought.

The interpretations of "Rabbi Ben Ezra," "Abt Vogler," and "Prospice" should be read entire. They are too good to be broken by quotation. We wish that Professor Phelps had expanded his commentary on "Abt Vogler" and had given his idea of its relation to the other poems on music, which he merely names.

The book closes, as one might say Browning's life closed, with the beautiful and inspiring epilogue to Asolando, the wonderful lines that have brought and will bring courage and hope to so many in the remembrance that the great poet

> Held we fall to rise, are baffled to fight better,
> Sleep to wake.

Not since Stopford Brooke's remarkable volume of mingled analysis and rhapsody has any work on Browning been published which is likely to reach with effect so wide an audience as this book of Professor Phelps's. He has certainly fulfilled the purpose he expresses at the close of his account of Browning's life: to make us "know that the author of the poems which thrill us was as great in character as he was in genius."

WILLIAM LINDSEY

Excerpts from an extended review in this week's Nation

"A really good romantic drama, one of the best that has been produced in a generation. . . . It is compact and well-made, developing swiftly and logically a tragic love story of uncommon interest, and is, moreover, exceedingly well written, in simple, smooth and vigorous blank verse, so adroitly handled as to offer no insuperable obstacles to the ordinary prose-speaking actor. . . . Genuinely poetic. . . . This is no machine-made structure of conventional sensations but true human drama arising out of the conflict of character and circumstance, romantic and pictorial, but entirely logical and natural. . . . That the 'Red Wine of Roussillon' is a remarkable work, both in the literary and dramatic sense, is certain."

sion, our hero has arranged that the secret of his formula shall be automatically released if within forty-eight hours he does not emerge from somewhere in Germany where the Kaiser has come to meet him in a Zeppelin. In vain does Imperial craft seek to wheedle from Richard Warden the composition of his incomparable mixture. The democratic young American, looking majesty straight in the eye, rebukes it for brutality, and uses such language that the Emperor is constrained to say that Warden's ignorance of court etiquette makes him impertinent. However, with a generosity born of a noble nature, the chemist who holds the fate of nations in his power, speaks to the ruler with deference when a group of brilliantly uniformed officers approach.

Touched by such magnanimity, the Kaiser remarks, when the suite has withdrawn:

> I noted the respect with which you addressed me in the presence of my staff, which I appreciated.

It does not prove necessary to subject all Germany to the laughing gas treatment for four hours and thus permit it to be run over by the Allies, for the War Lord makes peace and also apologises to the "good President of the United States" for sending a rude ultimatum. Warden reaps a reward of $10,000,000 from the coalition, wins his $100,000 wager, and gets a bonus for his work in connection with the submarine. Also, he gains the love and the entire approval of Miss Mary Berwin, who tells him that she thinks it is perfectly wonderful to be a hero.

In the expression of tenderer emotions Mr. Veiller is not at his best, but in the unfolding of his story of modern magic he is ever plausible and interesting.

HARDING OF ALLENWOOD

HARDING OF ALLENWOOD. By Harold Bindloss. With Frontispiece. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $1.30 net.

WHEN Craig Harding first came to Allenwood he was not received with open arms. Quite the contrary, in fact. For Harding was, apparently, a mere farmer from "the States," and Allenwood was an aristocratic settlement founded by Colonel Mowbray in order that a select and chosen few might lead in Saskatchewan the lives of English country gentlemen, a type of existence from which their modest means debarred them elsewhere. At Allenwood they could hunt and fish and live in the open air, with a little farming on the side. This plan worked well for several years and Allenwood flourished, but even before the advent of Harding a hint of change was in the air. The price of wheat had fallen and was steadily going down, with the result that those who had small private incomes or none at all were finding it impossible to make ends meet. Then Harding bought the land adjoining one of the Allenwood boundaries, Harding with his steam plow and his "commercial" ideas, abhorred of Colonel Mowbray. To complicate the situation yet more, Colonel Mowbray had a beautiful daughter and an utter'y worthless son. How the latter nearly wrecked Allenwood and his sister's happiness and how both were saved by Harding, the intruder, the story tells.

The book gives an interesting account of the difficulties of farming in Saskatchewan, with the long, bitter Winters and the short, hot Summers, the sandstorms, hailstorms, and droughts. There is, too, a rather well done sketch of Winnipeg, and, of course, the usual blizzards and hair-breadth escapes. Harding is a manly hero, and the rest of the characters play their somewhat stereotyped parts sufficiently well. Those who have enjoyed Mr. Bindloss's other books will be sure to like this one.

THE CROWN OF LIFE

THE CROWN OF LIFE. By Gordon Arthur Smith. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1 35 net.

THIS is the story of a young American girl, a New Englander with a background of traditions, who revolted from the conventions of her kind only to return to them when at the last she "found herself." Ruth Hollworthy is an orphan, one of the Hollworthys of East Westley, a family which had played an important and creditable part in the making of American history. Her father and mother, who died in swift succession when she was about 14, had lived in the old Hollworthy homestead and found life "a pleasant pastime." Ruth, left to the care of her two maiden aunts and with an income of her own of about six thousand a year, finds East Westley something of a trial, and presently goes to live in Boston with her friend, Mrs. Rudolph. When she is about 19 she and Mrs. Rudolph take a trip to Paris, and it is there that she has the adventure which so nearly wrecks her life.

Ruth herself is the crux of the novel; a clever girl who strives to adopt a character not her own, to be witty, flippant, cynical, and smart. She believes thoroughly in her charm, in the power of her beauty—and no wonder, considering the way men fall in love with her—and in her ability "to take care of herself." She is carefully studied and developed, and it is only at the very last that one doubts the truth of the author's portrayal, wonders a little whether he has not obliged her to conform to his two theories, viz., that men and women should remain in their natural habitat, clinging firmly to their traditions, and that "the blessing which passeth all understanding is that of peace." One cannot quite see vivid, eager Ruth as contented in an existence which "became * * * a pleasant pastime."

Although rather too long, the book is very well written. It contains an interesting glimpse of life in Boston, and some of those colorful pictures of Paris and the French to which the revelations of the present war furnish so ironical a comment. There are several excellently drawn characters, and the novel as a whole is interesting and worth while.

THE SONG OF THE LARK

THE SONG OF THE LARK. By Willa Sibert Cather. Houghton Mifflin Company. $1.40 net.

MISS CATHER'S new novel is a history rather than a story—the history from childhood to womanhood of one who was destined to become a great singer. Thea Kronborg was born in America, but of Swedish descent. When we first meet her she is a little girl 11 years old, one of a family of seven children. Her father is the minister of the Methodist church in a little town called Moonstone in Colorado. It is in Colorado, in this little frontier town, that Thea's childhood is spent, far away, it would seem, from any of the influences that might aid in developing a musician, but as Ray Kennedy tells her, "there are a lot of half-way people in this world who help the winners win and the failers fail." Many of these half-way people play important parts in Thea's career. Ray himself, who tragically provides the $600 which takes Thea to Chicago and Harsanyi: Professor Wunsch, the wanderer and drunkard, who laid the foundation of her musical education and laid it thoroughly and well: Dr. Archie, who not only helped her, but attained a certain success of his own; Spanish Johnny, the Mexican—these and several others, assist her on her way, wittingly or unwittingly, and some of them at least are able to rejoice in her triumph when at the last a great audience at the Metropolitan Opera House "met her with a roar" when she came before the curtain after the first act of "Die Walküre."

But this is the history of Thea's beginnings, not of her triumphs; of how a "Moonstone girl found her way out of a vague, easy-going world into a life of disciplined endeavor." The discipline, often self-imposed, is, however, there from the very first; in the little girl who took piano lessons from old Professor Wunsch and never let herself be baffled by any difficulty; in Bowers's accompanist, who hated and despised many of the popular singers he taught for their facile tricks, which served to cheapen the art, the ideals she loved. The very leisurely method of narration gives abundant space for every little detail of Thea's daily life and environment from her eleventh to her twentieth year. Moonstone, the canyon in Arizona where the ancient people, the cliff dwellers, once lived and from which Thea got a sense of antiquity, of history, and the early, pathetic reaching out of humanity toward something it could feel but very dimly; Chicago, Harsanyi's studio, and at last New York, when, after ten years in Germany, Thea returns as the great singer, to meet and struggle against the petty malices and jealousies of the Opera House—all these are well and clearly pictured.

It is a very ambitious book, this novel of Miss Cather; big, mature, carefully and conscientiously worked out. Thea herself is an admirably drawn character, and most of the people we encounter while following her career—the career she strove so hard to attain, sacrificing other things and people to it with a certain steady, calm ruthlessness—are real human beings. Her mother and Tillie are especially well done, and ought each to have at least a paragraph to herself. The style is clear and occasionally forceful, the descriptions vivid and full of color. "The Song of the Lark" is interesting and decidedly worth reading.

OFF SANDY HOOK

OFF SANDY HOOK, AND OTHER STORIES. By Richard Dehan. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company. $1.25.

THIS is a collection of English satires which has nothing whatever to do with the approach to New York Harbor. It has in it nothing of the sea, nothing of New York, nothing of America. And its initial tale, the story of a joke played by a ship's officer on a young newspaper man, is one of the least clever in the book. The prospective reader should be informed of all this, for the volume is peculiarly ill-named, and the person who likes sea tales, New York tales, or off-shore tales of any kind will be the last person in the world to enjoy "Off Sandy Hook." Given quite other tastes, there is entertainment in Richard Dehan's new collection of short stories.

For these are, for the most part, clever little bits at English society, and, in lesser numbers, flings at bright lights of the opera and music hall stage. In several instances Miss Graves combines the two as objects of her wit, and presents us with a younger son or two dancing in the gleam of those same bright lights and amusingly getting the worst of it in consequence. Indeed, the author of "Off Sandy Hook" (who is Clotilde Graves in private life and "Richard Dehan" on book covers) may be said quite decidedly to have it in for younger sons—impecunious, stupid, worthless, charming, lovable appendages to titled houses that do not know what to do with them.

Her younger sons trim hats and marry chorus girls and make love to rich widows and quarrel with their relatives and turn their family traditions upside down and have a tremendous amount of fun poked at them generally; but things always turn out well for them in the end. Richard Dehan's satire is never bitter, and there is nothing really caustic in her wit; she has a very kindly feeling toward these helpless boys, these troubled Duchesses, these frail and lovely ornaments of either titled or "professional" society; and whatever jokes fate may play upon them in her stories, there is always an affectionate "happy ending" which promises lifelong bliss to all. Freddy the aesthete, who turned milliner when fortune frowned; Cadminster the dyspeptic, who ate a lady's love letter to save her reputation; Valcourt the enfant terrible, who was anything but childlike in the management of affaires du coeur; Gerald Candelish, who loved a dancing fay—at these and her other heroes Miss Graves gibes right merrily, but with never-failing gentleness. The tales are as light and foolish bits of satire as one may find in the longest rainy day—and they will make the longest rainy day pass more gayly.

It is hard to forgive any author the American Duchess of one of the stories—who says "I guess" in every other sentence, who is repeatedly guilty of "cur'us," "cer'mony," "N' York," "vurry," and "liber'l," and whose dictionary knows no final "g." But none of the characters in these frivolous tales are very real. "Off Sandy Hook" is not meant to be "convincing." Its purpose is to amuse.

THREE GIRLS

IN the three following novels three different kinds of the genus girl make the book. Each one in her own story inspires the action, does much of it herself, fills the centre of the picture, and almost succeeds in being the whole of the story. In their social setting and in their activities they are widely different, but they are all alike in their stanch loyalty to those they love.

In "A Wild Goose Chase," (Duffield & Co., $1.35,) Edwin Balmer tells a story of the frozen North in which a Chicago girl seeks for her lover who has been lost for four years among the ice fields, the snow plains, and the Eskimo villages of the arctic. A white arctic goose shot in Louisiana has tied to its leg a bit of oiled silk on which the lost man had pricked her name and address and signed his name, with the message that he was well. The goose is sent to her, and at once she decides to search for him. A wealthy young man who has vainly sought to win her love bargains with her to furnish the money needed for the expedition if she will agree to marry him should the search end in disappointment. Most of the action takes place in the arctic, where they endure many hardships and face death by starvation. The narrative is graphic, there are many thrilling incidents, and the author contrives by several unexpected turns to keep the reader in suspense as to the outcome. The girl goes with the expedition, shares in all the perils and hardships, and shows herself always a strong, brave soul.

Margaret Cooper, whose "My Lady of the Chinese Courtyard" attracted some attention last year, has written a fresh, sweet-smelling little story of a New York dancing girl, called "Living Up to Billy." (Frederick A. Stokes Company, $1,) that shows how the good in a human soul, if it has some encouragement, can grow and become a power in evil environments. The girl tells her story herself in naïve, girlish letters to her sister, who is in the penitentiary. The sister is a thief, her husband is a thief, and the father of the two women is a criminal. But the younger sister reveals herself as possessing an untainted soul and longing in a dim sort of way, at the start, for clean surroundings. Then "Billy" is brought to her, the baby of her convict sister, and from that moment the child and her determination to give him the people and the surroundings she thinks he ought to have dominate her life. And by wanting this thing hard enough she finally makes it true, with many mishaps by the way and many backsets that discourage her for the time. She tells the story of it all to the sister in prison with much bad grammar and frequent lapses into the slang of crooks. She sketches in with a light hand vivid little pictures of her life as a dancing girl, working her way up from east side dance halls to Broadway shows, and gives also naïve views of country life on a Jersey farm as it looks to the eyes of a child of the streets who has never before been off of Manhattan Island. All the time she is living up to her determination to do the best she can for Billy, and the effort keeps her soul above the mire around her and by its own purity and unselfishness helps to regenerate other lives. The author has done a difficult thing with notable cleverness. For she has realised the girl, making her seem very much alive, and shown her as spreading her sweetening, purifying influence with simplicity and unconsciousness.

The girl in Kay Cleaver Strahan's "Peggy-Mary" (Duffield & Co., $1.25) is a butterfly sort of young creature, against whom the author unfortunately prejudices the reader early in the tale by the glucose-like manner of description. She is adored by everybody who comes within the circle of her influence, and she is so beautiful that the mere sight of her has weird effects upon those whose eyes but rest upon her face. She does unexpected things at every turn, and her butterfly wings flutter daintily over and through and above and around every page of the story. The half-dozen chapters are so many sections out of her life, and present her, in a prettily exaggerated sort of style, as being the centre of her adoring family circle, the other members of which live only to worship at her shrine. But she also, with all her fluffy, girly-girliness, proves that she can be stanch and true.

THE OFFICIAL CHAPERON

THE OFFICIAL CHAPERON. By Natalie S. Lincoln. Illustrated. D. Appleton & Co. $1.30 net.

Mrs. Calderon Fordyce was a very charming woman, but she had been seriously injured in a railway accident—so seriously, indeed, that she had become a hunchback. Consequently she was unable to go about with her pretty daughter, Janet, just presented to Washington society. But she did not wish Janet to go around alone, so she decided to engage an "official chaperon" for her in the person of Miss Marjorie Langdon, the daughter of an old schoolmate, whose family had met with financial reverses. Marjorie was only 24, but she knew Washington society through and through, was very popular, had lovely manners, and plenty of poise. Mrs. Fordyce and Janet were both delighted with her, but shortly after her advent there began a series of mysterious thefts, and she had been dismissed by her first employer, Admiral Lawrence, on account of the disappearance of a valuable paper. Many people, however, believed in her and took her part, and, being the heroine of the novel, she of course proved worthy of their confidence.

The plot is complicated and quite ingenious, but some of the incidents put rather too severe a strain on the reader's credulity, and the dénouement, though unexpected, is not very satisfactory, especially to those who know anything about auto-suggestion, a subject upon which the author's ideas are, to say the least, somewhat peculiar. Miss Lincoln has written stories far more entertaining than this one, which is, nevertheless, sufficiently interesting to fill an idle hour.

THE PRAIRIE WIFE

THE PRAIRIE WIFE. By Arthur Stringer. Illustrated. Bobbs-Merrill Company. $1.25 net.

When the unnamed heroine of Mr. Stringer's new novel married "the Other Man, to wit, Duncan Argyle McKail," later known to her as "Dinky-Dunk," she did it on the spur of the moment. And then she, who all her life had dwelt in cities, set off with him for their home on the prairie. Dinky-Dunk was a Scotch-Canadian, who had taken to wheat-growing after failing as a civil engineer, and the home was a tiny shack many miles from the nearest town. No wonder the "prairie wife" had to let off steam, as it were, somehow and some way, the way she chose being letters to her old friend, Matilda Anne. It is by means of these letters that the story is told.

The plot is of the very slightest, and the book consists principally of rose-colored sketches of life on those wide prairies which the author apparently loves very dearly. An overcivilized Englishman and a young Finnish peasant girl, who looks like a Norse goddess, are the leading characters in a subsidiary love story, the main theme being, of course, the wedded life of Dinky-Dunk and his wife. They are both very likable people, and she possesses a keen sense of humor, which helps them across one or two rather difficult places. The action is spread over a little more than a year, thus giving an opportunity for descriptions of the prairie at all seasons and in all kinds of weather, some of them very well done, indeed.

LITTLE MISS GROUCH

LITTLE MISS GROUCH. By Samuel Hopkins Adams. Illustrated. Houghton Mifflin Company. $1 net.

Mr. Adams's new story is of that light, dainty quality usually classed under Summer fiction. The events which it relates all happen on board the huge ocean liner Clan Macgregor, outward bound from New York to Liverpool. A very agreeable young man, Alexander Forsyth Smith, known to his friends as Sandy, is starting on his first transatlantic voyage when his attention is drawn to a tearful little female person, with swollen eyes, a red nose, an abundance of veils, and the dowdiest of costumes. Being a chivalrous youth, Sandy does his best for this very unattractive young woman—even after she has "brought a saber-edged heel down square upon his most afflicted toe of a very sore foot"—and his help, though accepted, is accepted in such an ungracious way that he nicknames her "Little Miss Grouch." But she chances to overhear him describing her to a friend as "so red-nosed and so homely," and next day—well, next day Mr. Alexander Forsyth Smith has the surprise of his young life.

It is all very pleasant fooling, gay, light-hearted, and amusing. One rather regrets that the author should have made such a caricature out of Mrs. Charlton Denyse. But much may be forgiven the portrayer of Judge Enderby, "the ablest honest lawyer in New York."

WITH SALLIE

UP THE ROAD WITH SALLIE. By Frances R. Sterrett. Illustrated. D. Appleton & Co. $1.25 net.

Sallie had acquired a roadster. It was the smartest of smart little cars, although it had "grown from a gallon of gasoline" kept under her bed; just how this had come about, friendly little Sallie was always quite willing to explain. And it was an important matter, for if she had not possessed the car she could not possibly have kidnapped Aunt Martha—otherwise known as Mrs. Joshua Cabot of Waloo, great lady and widow of Judge Cabot—whom nothing less vigorous than kidnapping could ever have induced to go "Up the Road with Sallie." For Aunt Martha had lived in the narrowest of conventional ruts all her sixty-three years, and was now weighed down with the responsibility of disposing of the Judge's millions, which he had requested her to leave to the worthiest of their several nephews and nieces.

Sallie and Aunt Martha had various adventures, and got themselves involved with two attractive young men and a perfect tangle of cross-purposes and misunderstandings. All of which helped to take ten years at least off Aunt Martha's age, besides providing a romance for Sallie. The account of their experiences makes a gay little story of the lightest kind, whose principal fault lies in its author's attempt to develop a full-length novel out of material sufficient only for a novelette.

THE HOUSE OF GLADNESS

THE HOUSE OF GLADNESS. By Emma S. Allen. Illustrated. Griffith & Rowland. $1.25 net.

Virginia Tyrrell had received the most inadequate kind of an education. So when she suddenly found herself obliged either to earn her own bread and butter or go hungry, she had anything but an easy time of it. True, there was one among the several men who had been her "suitors" while she was believed to be an heiress, who stood by her and was willing to loan her money without asking for compensation of any kind, but he refrained from offering her his hand and heart, preferring to keep as his own "that most unforgivable spot on earth, a self-centred man's deliberately chosen wifeless hearthstone." This enraged her, and she presently told him her opinion of such conduct, whereupon he went into sackcloth and ashes. However, Virginia's troubles were speedily dispelled when her uncle, a model minister, and his wife took her home to the "House of Gladness," in which they lived. Although not a first novel, the book is written in an amateurish style. There are some rather nice bits in it, but they are submerged under the superabundance of words and of moralising.

AUNT JANE

AUNT JANE. By Jennette Lee. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25 net.

A pretty, pleasant little story, hammered out very thin indeed so that it may cover the requisite number of pages, is Mrs. Lee's new book "Aunt Jane." The middle-aged heroine, Mrs. Jane Holbrook, is the matron of a hospital, the Berkeley House of Mercy, built and endowed by a rich and grateful patient of Dr. Carmon's. But though Dr. Carmon is the nominal head of the hospital, over which the donor gave him "absolute control," the real power is Aunt Jane. Tactful and efficient, warm-hearted, and strong willed, she is the most benevolent and best loved of despots. She has patients of all kinds and classes to deal with, from Mr. Herman G. Medfield, the millionaire, who occupied luxurious Suite A and was not used to obeying orders, to little Susie in the children's ward, whom a drunken father and mother had broken between them, and manages them all admirably. She is a very human and lovable character, and the account of the hospital she rules is interesting, if somewhat rose-colored.

There is a love story to furnish the wisp of a plot, and we feel that the man who won Aunt Jane was not only lucky, but deserved his good fortune.

QUERIES AND ANSWERS FROM TIMES READERS

ANSWERS BY THE EDITOR

ERIKA VON ZASTROW.—Will you please give a short biography of "Warwick Deeping"?

George Warwick Deeping, the English author, was born at Southend, Essex, in 1877. He is the son of George Davidson Deeping, who was for many years Justice of the Peace of the county. Young Deeping was educated at the Merchant Taylors' School in London and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was given the degree of B. A. in 1898, and obtained his M. A. and M. B. in 1902. After leaving college he studied at the Middlesex Hospital in London and subsequently practised medicine for about one year. He abandoned medicine for literature and has written a number of successful novels, which were published in this country by Cassell & Co., whose business has been acquired by the Funk & Wagnalls Company.

A. R. G.—Please let me know the publishers of Thomas Walsh's "Sunset Balconies."

"Sunset Balconies" appeared originally in Scribner's Magazine for Christmas, (December,) 1914, and is now published by the Macmillan Company, 66 Fifth Avenue, New York City. (Modern Poets Series,) under the title of "The Pilgrim Kings."

A. K.—Will you kindly advise me through your columns author's name and complete words of a poem in which the quotation "Give us men" is repeated several times?

Our correspondent probably has in mind the short poem by Dr. Josiah Gilbert Holland entitled "God Give Us Men," which runs as follows:

God give us men. The time demands
Strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and willing hands;
Men whom the lust of office does not kill;
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;
Men who possess opinions and a will;
Men who have honor, men who will not lie;
Men who can stand before a demagogue
And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking;
Tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog
In public duty and in private thinking!
For while the rabble with their thumb-worn creeds,
Their large professions and little deeds,
Mingle in selfish strife; lo! Freedom weeps!
Wrong rules the land, and waiting Justice sleeps!

LOUISE SHARP.—Can you tell me where I can get the poem called "Cumnor Hall"?

The dews of Summer night did fall,
The moon, sweet regent of the sky,
Silvered the walls of Cumnor Hall,
And many an oak that grew thereby.

The poem, "Cumnor Hall," by William J. Mickle, is printed in Coate's "Fireside Encyclopedia of Poetry," and in "My Recitations," by Cora Urquhart Potter, published by J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia.

G. EDWARD OSBORN.—Will you tell me the value of a set of J. Fenimore Cooper's novels, in thirty volumes, the edition of 1859?

The set of Cooper's novels, illustrated by Darley, published in New York, 1859-61, in thirty-two volumes, has brought at auction on various occasions prices ranging from $32 to $102.

L. F. S.—Will you please tell me about the poem beginning:

When you were a tadpole and I was a fish.

The poem for which our correspondent inquires is "Evolution," by Langdon Smith. It is printed in a dainty volume, with illustrations, published by John W. Luce & Co., Boston, Mass.

ANSWERS FROM READERS

EMMA SANDFORD HERENDEEN.—In your issue of Sept. 26 "P. E. M." asks for the poem "Auf Wiedersehen." I think the following is the one desired:

So near, so near, thine inmost thought I understand;
So far, so far away, I cannot touch thy hand.
So near, my life reflects the shadows of thine own;
So far, I cannot catch the echo of thy tone.
So near, so near, I share thy triumphs, hopes, and fears;
So far, I stand alone and face the sunset years.
So near, our souls commune as tho' no longer twain;
So far, our yearning arms reach forth in vain, in vain.
So near, and yet so far! God grant in yonder land,
Life's dawn may find us heart to heart and hand in hand.

The copy I possess is on one of the Collier leaflets, and no author's name is given.

This appeal was also answered by Miss Minnie Barton, Cornwall-on-Hudson, N. Y.; "E. C. C.," Brooklyn; Anne Estep Dickinson, Mount Vernon, N. Y.; L. S. Goff, New London, Conn.; Albert Lang, Fort Lee, N. J.; Mrs. J. Phillips Brown, New York, and Mrs. J. H. Bare, Weston, W. Va.

Mrs. WINCOTT.—In reply to the request of C. J. Heylmann in your issue of Aug. 22, I would say that the poem about which he inquired is evidently "The Human Mind," by William Cullen Bryant. I learned it at school from the Analytic Fifth Reader many years ago.

MILDRED L. HUNTER.—In answer to the appeal of "D. S." in your issue of Sept. 26, would say that the quotation is from "Life for a Life," by Mrs. Dinah Maria Mulock Craik.

Answers to this appeal were also received from "M. R. H.," Newark, N. J.; Pauline G. Loeb, New York; Elisabeth A. Stuart, Providence, R. I.; Florence O. Ryder, Patchogue, L. I.; C. B. Baker, New York, and C. K. Halsted, Mendham, N. J.

WITH PUBLISHERS AND AUTHORS IN THE FALL AND WINTER SEASONS

ELEVEN new numbers will be added to the Everyman's Library by E. P. Dutton & Co. early in November. Of particular interest will be Green's "Short History of the English People," in two volumes, edited and revised by L. Cecil Jane, and having an appendix of forty pages, by R. P. Farley, which gives a summary of events from the battle of Waterloo to the end of the nineteenth century, dealing especially with the developments in social policy and the life of the people. Mr. Jane has revised the work, without interfering with the author's text, by adding critical notes at the end of the sections and citing authorities. In a preface he sums up the value of the history. The volumes will include seven maps, six of them in color.

In biography one number will be "The Life of the First Duke of Newcastle," by Margaret, Duchess of Newcastle. Fiction will be represented by two titles—Gogol's "Dead Souls," translated by C. J. Hogarth, and Balzac's "Ursule Mirouet," with an introduction by George Saintsbury. In the drama there will be Ibsen's "Lady Inger of Ostraet," "Love's Comedy," and "The League of Youth," all in one volume, translated by R. Farquharson Sharp. Penn's "the Peace of Europe" and Newman's "On the Scope and Nature of University Education," with a paper on "Christianity and Investigation" and an introduction by Wilfrid Ward are the two volumes to be added to the section of essays. Three volumes of juveniles complete the list. They are Mrs. Ewing's "Overtheway's Remembrances and Other Stories," and also her "Jackanapes," "Daddy Darwin's Dovecot," and "The Story of a Short Life," with illustrations by R. Caldecott and Dora Curtis and an introduction by Mrs. Horatia K. F. Eden, and George MacDonald's "Phantastes: A Faerie Romance.

Among the most interesting of all the books that have been called out by the war will be the volume by David Lloyd George, now Minister of Munitions for the British Empire and previously Chancellor of the Exchequer, which the George H. Doran Company announces for Nov. 13. It will bear the title, "Through Terror to Triumph" and will contain his authoritative statement of what England has been endeavouring to do, against what obstacles and what she is achieving.

On the same day the Dorans will have ready a war book by Arnold Bennett, "Over There," which will set forth his first-hand impressions of the war. It will be illustrated from etchings by Walter Hale.

Norman Angell's new book, "The World's Highway," in which the author of "The Great Illusion" studies America's position and significance with reference to the problems brought about by the European War and especially in the matter of the neutralization of the sea, will be a Doran publication of the same date.

The Macmillans have ready for immediate publication a little book by Percy MacKaye entitled "A Substitute for War," which offers an answer to those who maintain that the purification of a nation is possible only by warfare and endeavors to show how the exaltation, the sacrificial spirit, and other qualities making for good can be inspired in other ways. Another war book which the Macmillans announce for publication this week presents its subject from an unusual viewpoint. It is by George W. Crile, the noted surgeon, and is entitled "A Mechanistic View of War and Peace." Dr. Crile was in charge of a hospital in France and his book treats of the phenomena and conditions that came under his observation.

"Vive la France!" by E. Alexander Powell, which will be an early Scribner publication, recounts the author's experiences during his second visit to the front when he had every opportunity for seeing the conflict at close range.

Three books dealing graphically with phases of the war are announced for early publication by E. P. Dutton & Co. "The Undying Story," by W. Douglas Newton, tells the tale of the historic retreat of the British from Mons to Ypres. "Germany in Defeat" is by Count Charles de Sousa and Major Haldane MacFall, who set forth the view that strategically Germany was defeated last Autumn and discuss the factors upon which will depend the length of the conflict. "Between the Lines," by Boyd Cable, is a volume of descriptions of actual war operations on the field of battle.

"My Year of the Great War," by Frederick Palmer, which Dodd, Mead & Co. will issue on Nov. 6, tells the story of what the author saw during the first year of the European war as an accredited American newspaper representative at the front with the British Army. On the same date this house will bring out "Modern Austria," by Virginio Gayda, which will present a comprehensive study of Austria, political and social, as it was at the outbreak of the war.

Copperus, is the second volume of a tetralogy of which the first, "Small Souls," was published last Fall. "The Path of Life" will be the first introduction to English readers of the work of Stijn Streubels, who enjoys a good reputation in his own country.

The John Lane Company has ready for immediate issue "Broken Shackles," by John Oxenham, the romance of an aide-de-camp of Napoleon III.

Another volume of Henri Fabre's "Souvenirs Entomologiques" will be published at the end of this week by Dodd, Mead & Co., the sixth in the series which they purpose shall finally include the whole of the great Provençal's famous and delightful writings. M. Fabre died in his little cottage in Southern France on Oct. 11 at the age of 92, after a life spent until the last few years in poverty and adversity. Dodd, Mead & Co. have published an illustrated pamphlet on his life and work, which they will send free of charge to any one making the request.

Among the hundred and more who have written to the Century Company concerning the authorship of "Me" is one Sherlock-Holmesey person who is certain that the novel presents internal evidence proving the author to be a man.

Lady Gregory, whose "Seven Short Plays" is a recent publication, is now in the United States, and will spend some months here travelling and lecturing in various parts of the country.

When the Harpers recently learned that an English edition of Booth Tarkington's "Turmoil" was about to be sent to Australia, which would interfere with their own edition, already on the market, they took prompt steps and cabled to their representative in Sydney, "Stopping English 'Turmoil,'" and learned a little later that the censor had held up their cable for two days until it could be investigated.

Eleanor Atkinson's "Johnny Appleseed" has been placed on the list of books of the Pupils' Reading Circle of Indiana.

The brother of Compton Mackenzie, whose several novels, of which the latest is "Plashers Mead," just published, have attracted much attention in this country, has recently left the United States, where he had been acting for some time, to join his regiment, the Royal Inniskillen Fusiliers. Mr. Mackenzie's sister, Fay Compton, is also on the stage in this country.

The dramatic rights of Nina Wilcox Putnam's "The Impossible Boy," have been bought by Mr. Morosco, who will have the book made into a starring vehicle for Peggy O'Neil. The play will be presented in Los Angeles in November.

Richard Pryce has dramatized Arnold Bennett's "Helen of the High Hand," and the play was presented recently in Liverpool with great success.

What is said to have been the first occasion of the presence of any member of the English royal family at a movie performance took place recently when Princess Marie Louise of Schleswig-Holstein attended a private exhibition of a film play made from Victor Bridges's novel, "A Rogue by Compulsion," an Autumn publication.

THEODORE DREISER—A PORTRAIT

By Edgar Lee Masters
Author of "Spoon River Anthology"

Written for The New York Times Review of Books

SOUL enrapt demi-urge,
Walking the earth,
Stalking life.

Jack o'Lantern, tall shouldered,
One eye set higher than the other,
Mouth cut like a scallop in a pie
Aslant, showing powerful teeth,
Swaying above the heads of others,
Jubilant, with fixed eyes scarcely sparkling,
Moving about rhythmically, exploding with laughter,
Touching fingers together, back and forth,
Or toying with a handkerchief,
And the eyes burn like a flame at the end of a funnel,
And the ruddy face glows like a pumpkin
On Halloween!

Or else a gargoyle of bronze
Turning suddenly to life
And slipping suddenly down corners of stone
To eat you:
Full of questions, objections,
Distinctions, instances,
Contemptuous, ironical, remote,
Cloudy, irreverent, ferocious,
Fearless, grim, compassionate yet hateful,
Old yet young, wise yet virginal,
To whom everything is new and strange,
Whence he stares and wonders,
Laughs, mocks, curses—
Disordered, yet with a passion for order
And classification—hence the habitual
Folding into squares of a handkerchief.

Or else a well cultivated and fruitful valley,
But behind it unexplored fastnesses,
Gorges, precipices, and heights
Over which thunder clouds hang,
From which lightning falls,
Stirring up terrible shapes of prey
That stink about in the blackness.
The silence of him is terrifying
As if you sat before the sphinx.
The look of his eyes makes tubes of the air
Through which you are magnified and analysed.
He needs nothing of you and wants nothing.
He is alone and content,
Self-mastered and beyond friendship,
You could not hurt him.
If he would allow himself to have a friend
He could part with that friend forever
And in a moment be lost in wonder
Staring at a carved rooster on a doorstep
Or at an Italian woman
Giving suck to a child
On a seat in Washington Square.

Soul enrapt demi-urge,
Walking the earth,
Stalking life.

It will contain also a chapter on Italia Irredenta.

The Frederick A. Stokes Company announces for early publication five of Gabriele d'Ambunzio's works, "The Triumph of Death," "The Virgin of the Rocks," "The Victim," "The Flame of Life," and "The Child of Pleasure," to be published each in a separate volume.

On Nov. 6 the Houghton Mifflin Company will publish Richard Pryce's new novel, "David Penstephen," the story of a young Englishman from childhood to manhood.

Small, Maynard & Co. announce two novels for issue at the end of this week, "The Son of the Otter," by George Van Schaick, a tale of the trackless wastes of the Canadian fur country, and "Sunlight Patch," by Credo Harris, a Kentucky story of the awakening of a young country giant.

Two new novels will be published this week by Dodd, Mead & Co., both translations from Dutch authors. "The Later Life," by Louis

"POSITIVE MISFORTUNE IF NEW CONSTITUTION IS REJECTED"

Louis Marshall, Delegate to Constitutional Convention, Declares That Its Adoption Will Mean Complete Reorganization of Government and Placing Responsibility for Management of Public Affairs Where It Belongs.

By Louis Marshall.

ALTHOUGH, since 1894, five Presidents and ten Governors have been voted for by the electors of this State, the coming election will transcend all previous ones in importance. Upon its outcome depend the structure of our Government, the liberty of our citizens, the conservation of our resources, and the happiness of our people.

The convention, after five months of careful and conscientious labors, with singular unanimity, adopted thirty-three amendments to the Constitution. Of the one hundred and sixty-eight delegates, 116 were Republican and 52 Democrats; yet there was never gathered in this State a body in which there was less political partisanship and more patriotism and which evidenced a more earnest desire to subserve the public interest. Although the Republican majority had it in its power to frame a Constitution which would give to it political advantages, it studiously refrained from availing itself of the opportunity. It did not undertake to reapportion the State. In the organization of the executive department it deferred until 1917 the operation of the new system, and thereby made it possible, if a Democratic Governor were elected, for him to appoint the heads of all important departments, although it would have been natural for such a change to have gone into operation on Jan. 1, 1916, under the auspices of a Republican Governor. It extended to the great Democratic centres home rule, and in numerous other instances exercised a degree of self-restraint which is novel in the history of American politics.

As a consequence of this spirit of fairness, which, during the convention, was appreciated by the Democratic leaders, a majority of the amendments received a unanimous vote. Of the remaining propositions, the vote in favor of the amendments was more than ten to one, and in no case was the vote less than two to one; and in no instance, not even on apportionment, was there a division on strictly party lines. There is, therefore, an overwhelming presumption that the conclusion reached by the delegates was sound, and that the welfare of the people who had intrusted them with the framing of a new Constitution had been furthered.

It would, therefore, seem to be a safe and sound policy for any fair-minded elector of the State to act favorably upon the recommendations of the convention; otherwise it would be indicative of a lack of faith in the men who were chosen to perform these important duties because of their supposed fitness to discharge them. The delegates-at-large received majorities approximating 150,000, which is certainly an indication that it was believed when they were elected that they were entitled to the confidence of the people. It is, therefore, incumbent on those who desire to nullify the work of their hands to show controlling reasons for doing so.

Thus far there has been nothing but carping criticism with regard to matters which, at the most, are of slight importance; complaints by faddists that their particular brand of reform was not adopted; assertions that the convention should have done more than it did, and veiled efforts on the part of selfish interests to create obstacles to the operation of the great reforms in government which are contained in the Constitution, and which, if adopted, may prove unpalatable to them.

There is no occasion for the framers of the new Constitution to adopt a defensive attitude. There is so much of sterling merit, of sound statesmanship, of homely common sense, in the amendments that have been adopted that it is only necessary to state what has been done to convince any intelligent man that it would be a positive misfortune to the State if the new Constitution were rejected.

Reorganized Departments.

The three great departments of the Government, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial, have been thoroughly reorganized. The lessons of the experience of the last twenty years have been capitalized in concrete form. The wastefulness of our Government, due to a multiplication of offices and lack of co-ordination and failure to appreciate the principles of sound finance, as a result of which the annual cost of operation has been trebled in twenty years, called imperatively for a complete and thorough change. There were 452 different executive departments and bureaus, overlapping, with indefinite and vague areas of activity, with conflict of authority, duplication, and triplication of jurisdiction, and operating according to methods which made it practically impossible to locate responsibility and to bring about either efficiency or economy. The convention reached the conclusion that no business, whether it be private or public, can be successfully conducted unless it is known to all men where the responsibility for its management lies. Unless the electors of the State can lay their hand on some individual and say, "Thou art the man," whenever the welfare of the State suffers injury, there can never be a Government which will respond to the public needs.

Recognizing that fact, it was determined that the executive responsibility should be imposed upon the Governor, where it belongs; that there should be no division of that responsibility by imposing conflicting duties upon other public officials; that the State Government should be divided into seventeen responsible departments, the heads of which are to be answerable to the Governor, removable by him, or subject to impeachment, and that the activities of all existing bureaus, and any that may hereafter be created, should be distributed among these departments, thus enabling a responsible Governor to have responsible subordinates, each of whom he may call to account if anything is found lacking in the management of his government.

This is a practical application of the short ballot principle to the needs of the State, with due regard to its historic development, and with a reasonable consideration for the experience of the last century. One who has intelligently studied our political conditions can see naught but inestimable good in this application of sound business principles to the greatest corporation in the State—the State itself.

Annual State Budget.

Every prudent householder, every experienced merchant, from time to time prepares a budget of his reasonably anticipated income and of his necessary expenditures, unless he is prepared to wind up in the bankruptcy court. There is not a successful commercial enterprise which is not conducted on the same theory. Yet our State has hitherto carried on its manifold activities, involving an annual expenditure in recent years of over $50,000,000, without the slightest semblance of a budget. Its affairs are conducted haphazard. The Legislature has made its appropriations according to the rule of thumb. The Governor has been powerless, except in so far as he has been enabled to exercise the veto power. In the application of that safeguard he has acted without adequate information.

The time has now come when ordinary prudence dictates a change of policy. The proposed new Constitution provides a remedy. The Governor, with the aid of his department heads, is required to present to the Legislature annually a budget. He is thus responsible if there is any extravagance or if there is a failure to provide adequately for the needs of the State.

The Legislature may reduce the amount called for by the budget. It may not increase the amount. After the budget has been acted upon, the Legislature may, on its own responsibility, but subject to the veto of the Governor, undertake to make other appropriations, but its powers are limited, and no public moneys or property are permitted to be appropriated for any public work until plans and estimates of the cost have been filed with the Secretary of State by the Superintendent of Public Works and the necessity that the improvement be made at the public expense has been duly certified. No appropriation other than that provided for in the budget, except by separate bills, each being limited to a single work or subject, can be made.

If this fiscal plan is adopted, then the public will know who is responsible for any abuse which may arise. The Legislature can no longer blame the Governor, nor can he shoulder his shortcomings, if any there be, on the Legislature. The public moneys cannot be used for local purposes, unless the Superintendent of Public Works, who represents the Governor and is removable by him, takes the responsibility. Empirical methods of administration are relegated into obscurity. The radiant light of publicity will henceforth illumine our State finances, which have hitherto been shrouded in darkness.

New Way to Meet Obligations.

The financing of the State obligations, which, until now, has proven a succession of blunders, which has imposed upon the taxpayers enormous and unnecessary burdens, and compelled the State to pay outrageously for the privilege of issuing its bonds, will, under the new Constitution, become a matter of simplicity. There will no longer be unnecessary accumulations in the sinking fund. The debt of the State will be in the form of serial bonds, which will require it to pay as it goes along, and not to heap up huge burdens for future generations, while at the same time those who are now in active life are compelled to make huge payments of interest and vast contributions to the sinking fund, which are entirely unnecessary.

Under the new system, no obligation will be carried beyond the period which marks the life of the improvement for which it was incurred. Under our existing system of finance, when, for example, a highway is constructed, the life of which is not to exceed ten years, the State issues bonds running for the period of fifty years, and in the meantime pays interest and accumulates a sinking fund for the purpose of meeting those obligations at their maturity, for forty years after the highway has disintegrated. Under the new system such a shocking state of affairs will become impossible, because the bonds to be issued cannot extend beyond the life of the improvement, and, therefore, when the improvement has ceased to be of value, it will have been fully paid for.

Vital Judiciary Changes.

The Judicial Department of the State has, in the last twenty years, outgrown in many respects the garment in which it was robed by the Constitution of 1894. That was a distinct advance on the previous system. But the great increase in population and in the wealth of the State, and its importance as a world centre of finance, have resulted in increased litigation. The growth of our large cities, especially of New York, has made vital changes necessary, and hence there exists a crying demand that the judiciary article shall be up to date.

That has been accomplished in the proposed Constitution. It is so framed as to minimize the law's delays, so far as it is humanly possible to do so. Important provisions have been inserted which clearly define the respective functions of the trial courts and of the several appellate tribunals. Those who have given the subject careful study are satisfied that many of our most serious problems have been met.

The new article also paves the way for a great reform in judicial procedure. It requires the Legislature to pass proper enactments for the simplification of the practice. After the enactment of the initial legislation the constant tinkering with our procedural law, which has become a scandal, will cease, and the courts, which are best adapted to establish rules of procedure, will be enabled to regulate matters of practice in such a way as to obviate technicalities and dilatory manouevres, and to relieve litigants from the obstructions with which their path to justice has long been strewn.

The new judiciary article also makes provision for the appointment of Supreme Court Commissioners, who are to be designated by the Appellate Divisions, and whose compensation is to be fixed with the approval of the Board of Estimate and Apportionment. These Commissioners are not permitted to practice and must be members of the bar of not less than ten years' standing; are to hold their offices during the pleasure of the respective Appellate Divisions by which they have been appointed, and are required to devote all of their time to the hearing of actions and proceedings which are referred to them. That will obviate the heart-breaking delays, the enormous expense, and the unfairness, which have in the past so characterized our condemnation proceedings and matters of accounting, as to become a stench in the nostrils of decent men. It will become possible to eliminate the barnacles that have impeded progress and that have rendered the administration of the law, in certain phases of it, contemptible.

Conservation Reforms.

The conservation of our natural resources and their administration have presented problems of a momentous character. There has been an entire lack of order and system, a crying need for a policy. Selfish interests have lain in wait for the purpose of absorbing for their own benefit our forests and our water powers. They have been diligent in trying to create a false sentiment which would enable them to commercialize our great forest preserves in the Adirondacks and the Catskills, and to take unto themselves the benefits to be derived therefrom. They had succeeded in inducing the Legislature to propose a constitutional amendment which, if adopted, would have served as an entering wedge into the integrity of our forests.

Fortunately, through overzeal, this plan was frustrated. The convention lent a deaf ear to all their pleadings, and recognized that upon the conservation of our forests depends the conservation of our water courses. Upon that, in turn, are dependent not only our navigation, but also our municipal water supplies and the fertility of our soil. Because of the errors of the past many of our streams have dried up. Within the past twenty-five years the subterranean water level throughout the State has fallen more than three feet, all due to the diminution of our forests.

Upon the continuance, therefore, of the Adirondack and Catskill preserves, and upon their extension by means of reforestation, rests the future prosperity of the State. It is as certain as death that unless our forests are preserved and increased our fertile fields will become as arid as those of Palestine and Mesopotamia. It will take centuries to restore what can be destroyed in a moment of thoughtlessness. There is only one safe course, and that is to prohibit entirely any interference with the forest preserve.

The convention therefore laid down the principle that the lands of the State, now owned or hereafter acquired, constituting the forest preserve as now fixed by law, shall be forever kept as wild forest lands. They shall not be leased, sold, or exchanged or be taken by any corporation, public or private; nor shall the trees and timber thereon be sold, removed, or destroyed. The Department of Conservation is, however, empowered to reforest lands in the forest preserve, to construct fire trails thereon, and to remove dead trees and dead timber therefrom, for purposes of reforestation and fire protection solely, but shall not sell the same. Efforts were made to permit the forests to be intersected by means of roads and highways and paths of various kinds, but the convention set its face against these allurements and permitted but a single State highway to be constructed upon a designated route, which could be used for purposes of fire protection.

In order to provide a proper administration of the forests, subject to the limitations which have just been named, and also to deal generally with the subject of conservation, provision was made for the appointment of nine Commissioners, who are to serve without compensation, who are to be appointed by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for terms of nine years, so as to enable the adoption and carrying out of a continuous policy. One Commissioner is required to reside in each judicial district. No person is eligible to act as Commissioner who is engaged in the business of lumbering or in any business in the prosecution of which hydraulic power is used or in which water is distributed or sold under any public franchise. They are subject to removal by the Governor on charges, after an opportunity to be heard.

The comprehensive character of this plan is indicated by the fact that the department is charged with the development and protection of the natural resources of the State; the encouragement of forestry and the suppression of forest fires throughout the State, the exclusive care, maintenance, and administration of the forest preserve; the conservation, prevention of pollution, and regulation of the waters of the State; the protection and propagation of its fish, birds, game, shellfish, and crustacea, except migratory fish of the sea within the limits of the marine district, with the power, subject to the veto within thirty days of the Governor, to enact regulations with respect to the taking, possession, sale, and transportation thereof, which shall have the force of law until and unless the Legislature shall thereafter modify such regulations. The Legislature is also required to make annual provision for the purchase of real estate within the Adirondack and Catskill parks, as defined by law, for the reforestation of lands and the making of boundary and valuation surveys.

When one considers that there are now in this State over ten million acres of waste lands which are only adapted for forest plantation, it must at once be recognized that there is no subject so important and so far-reaching as that which the convention has taken up in this efficient manner. There is every reason to believe that, by means of this newly created department, a solution may be found of problems upon which the happiness of future generations depends.

Additions to Bill of Rights.

The Bill of Rights has been preserved in all its sanctity, but a number of important additions have been supplied which have been found to be necessary. They can only be briefly mentioned:

1. Any person may, in the manner prescribed by law, after examination or commitment by a magistrate, waive indictment and trial by jury on a charge of felony punishable by not exceeding five years' imprisonment, or of an indictable misdemeanor, all subsequent proceedings being had by information before a superior court of criminal jurisdiction or a Judge or Justice thereof. This will obviate delays in criminal procedure which are not only unjust to the persons accused of crime but also injurious to the public. It will do away with grievous hardships which have been unavoidable under our present system. It will lead to a more intelligent and efficient administration of criminal justice.
2. A party accused in any criminal case shall have the right to at least one appeal.
3. No person shall be denied the equal protection of the laws. These are golden words of freedom.
4. When private property is taken for public use the compensation to be made therefor, when not made by the State, shall be ascertained by the Supreme Court without a jury, or by one or more Supreme Court Commissioners.
5. Where condemnation proceedings are instituted by a civil division of the State compensation shall be paid for such taking unless the Supreme Court, after hearing, because of public necessity, shall otherwise direct.
6. General laws may be passed permitting the owners or occupants of swamp or agricultural lands to construct and maintain for the drainage thereof necessary drains, ditches, and dikes upon the lands of others, under proper restrictions, on making just compensation, which shall be assessed against the property benefited thereby.
7. The Legislature may authorize, for the establishment of a uniform system of streets, to take real property within an abandoned street or highway and to sell and lease it.
8. Provision is made not only for workmen's compensation for death and injuries by accident, but also for the consequences of occupational diseases.

Important Suffrage Amendment.

In respect to the suffrage an important amendment has been proposed which provides for special registration on personal application before such boards of officers as the Legislature shall designate, on a day or days not more than five months prior to the day of election, of such electors as shall then declare under oath that they are engaged in a regular vocation or occupation which will occasion their absence from the county during each of the regular days of registration. The voters chiefly affected will be Federal employes at Washington, railroad men who operate trains, and commercial travelers, although the amendment is not confined to these classes. It meets a long-existing demand, and can only result in good.

Home Rule of Cities.

One of the most important reforms contained in the new Constitution is that which confers home rule upon cities. For half a century our great centres of population have prayed for the bestowal of home rule privileges as to their local affairs. Until 1894 nothing was done in that direction. With great difficulty the convention which met in that year adopted what is now known as the suspensive vote, which required that in any case of special legislation affecting less than all the cities of a class, the Mayor of the locality concerned would have the right to express his disapproval of the measure, and thereupon it would become incumbent upon the Legislature again to act upon the bill, with due regard to the objections urged by the local authorities. This had a salutary effect, but it was found in practice to be inadequate.

After very careful deliberation it was decided that every city should have exclusive power to manage, regulate and control its property, affairs, and municipal government, subject to the provisions of the Constitution with regard to the power to incur indebtedness and which limited the rate of taxation. With respect to such matters, the cities of the State are authorized to adopt revised charters or to enact amendments to existing charters, upon which, however, legislative action is necessary in so far as they relate to matters of State concern. The Legislature may delegate to the cities, for exercise within their local jurisdiction, such of its powers of legislation as to matters of State concern as it may from time to time deem expedient, but it may at any time deal with these subjects; but it shall not pass any law relating to the property, affairs, and municipal government of any city except such as is applicable to all the cities of the State, without classification or distinction. The powers of the Legislature to pass laws regulating matters of State concern, as distinguished from matters relating to the property, affairs, the municipal government of cities, are not however restricted. The suspensive veto is retained with respect to certain subjects which constitute matters of State concern, and which apply to less than all the cities of the State.

While this is not absolute home rule, it constitutes a step further in advance in the direction of home rule than has ever before been taken or even contemplated. Nobody who has any idea as to the structure or framework of our Government would for a moment champion the absolute independence of our municipalities. Like every person and corporation within the boundaries of the State they are, and must be, subject to its sovereignty.

They are the creation of the State. They are a part of it. All that they can, therefore, justly demand is the power of dealing with matters which are of purely local concern, as distinguished from those which are of State concern. The State can not, and should not, abdicate its functions of government with respect to the latter. As to the former, it is right and just that our municipalities shall have the same rights and privileges as corporations have with respect to their own affairs.

It is curious, however, that some of those who in the past have vociferously demanded home rule are now attempting to create a feeling that the grant in the new Constitution is too extensive. Is it possible that they have been insincere in their past protestations, that their slogan "Home Rule for Cities" has been merely a political catchword, and that they regret that by the ratification of the new Constitution they may be deprived of a political issue?

An attempt has been made to frighten the school teachers, policemen, and firemen into the belief that under the home rule article the Municipal Governments may deprive them of their positions without the right of court review. There is no semblance of justice in this suggestion.

So far as the teachers are concerned they constitute a part of the educational department of our Government. Education is a State function, a matter of State concern. Hence, without the consent of the Legislature there can be no municipal interference with those who constitute a part of our educational forces. That is so under our existing law, and that continues to be the controlling principle under the new Constitution.

So far as the police and firemen are concerned, there is an equal lack of justification for the insidious suspicions which have been expressed. Although the power is given to the municipal governments to regulate the powers, duties, qualifications, mode of selection, compensation and method of removal of all city officers

Kitty Gordon a Patron

Of the New Bedell Fashion Shop

(Opposite the Waldorf-Astoria)

The Winter Garden Star and Her Dinner Party

NO woman on the stage is better known for her taste in dress than Kitty Gordon. She is an authority, on both sides of the ocean—rated for her close study of details. She knows every requirement of the newest model of the season.

It was, perhaps, natural that she should be attracted to the new Bedell Fashion Shop in Thirty-fourth Street, which had the indorsement of Lady Duff-Gordon at its opening and has already won the patronage of many of the leading women of the metropolis.

Women generally will be much interested in the fact that Kitty Gordon has given the new shop her patronage and unqualified approval. She came to look—and she picked out a very becoming gown, for a special dinner occasion. That such an authority, with unlimited opportunity to secure the ultra fashions, passes thus favorably upon the styles in the new fashion shop, is another proof added to the many already furnished, that the styles here shown are authoritative.

Suits and Coats Tomorrow at $25 to $50

As in the case of Lady Duff-Gordon, many of the lower priced suits, frocks and coats in the new establishment attracted the eminent English actress as much as the highest priced things. She emphasized the possibility for metropolitan women, accustomed to the very smartest things, to secure at $25 to $50 a coat or suit carrying with it all the style of those priced at $100 to $200. Tomorrow there is a greatly increased assortment of these $25 to $50 coats and suits.

Alterations Made Free

In this new fashion shop, your fittings and alterations, made by the same type of artists as those employed in the highest-priced shops in Fifth Avenue, are free of charge.

FUR-TRIMMED LEATHER COATS NOW FASHIONABLE

Layers of Colored Fabrics for Evening Wear, with Diaphanous, Transparent Scarfs and Capes---Many Variations of Accepted Styles Seen.

ONE of the interesting developments of the last year is the evident establishment of the fashion show. The first one which received smart and conspicuous acknowledgment was given at a fashionable hotel last Autumn under the auspices of Vogue; in that only New York designs were shown in order to give encouragement to American talent, which was supposed to need swift recognition and approval because of the supposed inability of France to supply us with the usual quota.

Nothing definite was accomplished by it as far as the original designing was concerned, but a small fortune was netted for the sewing girls of Paris and the wheels began to turn in fashion shows.

The idea needed just such an impetus to popularize it. The idea itself was not new but the fashion exhibits that had been held were to the interest of an individual or a group of workers and they made an appeal only to the trade, whereas this present development caters to those who buy clothes and are the final judges, those whose opinion in the end is responsible for the success or the failure of a season.

The effort to show only American designs which reached its culmination in the show at the house of Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs in Newport has ceased, as it would be expected to do when the French models made their appearance.

There is little doubt that the constant appeal to the dressmakers to show original creations and the consequent exploitation of what was created had its effect on the dressmakers who are strenuously trying to evolve good ideas in this country. On the other hand the monthly appeals on every side resulted in wholesale refusals. As the head of one of the most famous Fifth Avenue houses put it: "The one way in which to keep our clientele these days is to give them something that has not become commonized through public exploitation; we even guard unusual gowns by keeping them out of the window. We gain nothing and may lose all by allowing our best work to be shown at fashion exhibitions and for that reason I have refused all invitations to do it except in one case where the models were worn by society women, and the gown I created was worn by one of my customers. In short, why give every one a chance for $2 to copy the costume which you desire to sell for $800 to one woman who will refuse it if it has been shown."

Not Showing American Gowns.

With this almost united effort against the fashion show by the only ones who could make the affair a success, it was to be expected that foreign models would be shown and these would have to be bought abroad and not solicited here.

Two very successful shows were held in New York recently on this basis. Both were in theatres and cost their producers a pretty penny, and they were a boon to those who desired to see the entire panorama of Paris clothes in one fell swoop; the process eliminated the necessity of going through many shops and ateliers to find the sum and substance of the French output this season.

True, but what is flesh for one is poison for another. The curious public was eminently pleased and satisfied, but those who had exclusive fashion openings in their own places, at a great cost, with the high hope that they would offer new things to their paying customers were compelled to realize that their thunder had been stolen.

Whether or not these public showings of all French models at so much a head will have any actual effect on the buying of these same models by women, is not easy to say. Women must have seasonable clothes and they must buy something from the mass that is offered them, and their one hope lies in choosing a costume that half the other people do not choose. The same assortment is offered everywhere, for at this season of the year, as in March, all the pitchers are filled at the same well—the same being a small area in Paris.

Among the importers there is quite a stir anent these continual fashion shows, because the costume that one house lends to the public exhibition has been bought at a large price by another, and the chance of a good sale immediately diminishes.

Take, as an example, the now well-known suit of Robin Hood green broadcloth created by Callot with its pajama undership of dark-red satin, the square trouser legs edged with skunk and serving as a petticoat, while its shirt-like upper part serves as a blouse when the coat is lifted; this convenient and good-looking suit which popularized pantalettes, was publicly shown on its arrival here at a fashion show, and the public's familiarity with it increased so rapidly that certain exclusive houses withdrew it from offerings to their customers. No one would pay its price for they realized that it would be copied probably in half the shops in the country.

This is true, also, of several of the models brought over here in September, especially certain ones made by Jenny and Jeanne Lanvin, but they are less conspicuous than the Callot innovation.

That dinner gown by Worth, called "Lord Byron," made of black velvet with a bodice of strass-studded rhinestones, its attention-compelling feature being the square train cascaded down the sides to give the pannier effect, lined with pink satin, is already in the hands of the multitude.

This situation, mind you, is deplored only by the importers and the customers who pay the importers' prices. No one else cares, for every one else is benefited. It is this very situation in apparel in this country that makes us so fashionably dressed in the mass. The last idea involved in Paris goes by rural delivery in the form of a paper pattern to the women who never see the lights of a great city. The stenographer at her desk, the girl behind the counter, the waitress at a ten-cent restaurant has the chance to wear what Paris dictates, and she does it. She is the one who criticises the fashion articles that do not cater to her desire to be first in the field of fashionable apparel—be the fabric what it may.

Oh! that the editors could be well assured of this fact, for they have the traditional belief, left over from a time that is shelved, that women of small incomes are not interested in the latest fashions, and only buy clothes that will outwear the seasons, and try to impose that error on writers and artists.

"Roast beef, medium," is what they cry out for at all seasons of the year, whereas it's ice cream and sundaes that the girl wants. Nothing so insults the great bulk of American womanhood with small incomes as to insist that it shall not have a finger in the pie of smart, new clothes and that it shall content itself with stale things—with the crumbs from the rich man's table.

Gowns You May Like.

New things are still being shown, although sales are already announced of original Paris models while the Autumn is young and half the people hadn't even bought their first new costumes.

There is an evening frock by Paquin of pink and blue chiffon with a touch of velvet and a cape of white lace that is attractive. The idea of combining transparent fabrics in pastel shades is in keeping with the introduction of Nattier, Boucher, and Fragonard gowns. It was made familiar to us through the stage last Winter, but this fact does not seem to decrease its popularity or throw a damper on its acceptance.

The placing of a pointed cape on so diaphanous an evening gown is an original thought and it is in keeping not with the era immediately before the Revolution, but with its own stormy days. Observe the décolletage, for its insistence is interesting. When it appears once in a season it may be an accident; when it appears more than a dozen times it is an established fashion. It is not an easy line to wear; it is bad on the majority of women, and yet it is quite probable that it will supersede the square and V-shaped décolletage, more's the pity.

Another evening gown that is good enough to describe is of orangeade velvet and chiffon, a shade to which the French are addicted this Autumn. The wide skirt of chiffon is scalloped at the hem, edged with fur and shows a velvet petticoat, a reversal, you see, of the usual method.

The bodice of yellow velvet has shoulder drapery of brown tulle that floats around the skirt. This combination of brown and yellow has been revived from two years ago. The present passion for brown peltry probably inspired it.

There is a designer named Maurer in Paris, whose name is not heralded far and wide, but whose costumes are bought and sold by the most important American houses. An admirable gown she made this season carries out the moyen age effect. It has a green velvet bodice with armholes, shoulders, elbows, and hips outlined with a broadly striped silk. There are women who would dislike to have their curves and angles so definitely marked out and brought to notice, but the color effect is good. The striped silk, itself, is framed in with a narrow edge of gold braid; this manipulation of trimming is one of those trifles that count in clothes and is always gratefully received by the woman who is in search of some ornamentation not commonplace.

The skirt beneath this mediaeval green bodice is of biscuit colored cloth to match in color the barrel-shaped sleeves of biscuit colored chiffon. There's novelty for you.

Do You Like Leather Coats?

Paquin gets the credit of inventing the leather jacket, but many designers must have followed on her heels quickly, for several of these coats appear under several names. The one that bears her label is of white leather, very thin, collared and cuffed with fur. It buttons straight down the front and has a wide slit pocket at each hip.

It is a novelty, of course, like the fascinating little muff that Worth invented. It consists of two small pockets of fur joined in the middle with a fanciful cord. With these Worth introduces long gloves of soft kid, laced at the sides and finished with tassels.

Ladies wore these when they hunted in the forests with falcons on their wrists, didn't they?

AUTUMN NOVELTIES AT THE SHOPS.

Alabaster Lamps.

A LAMP that stands four feet high, on a fluted standard of dull gilt, with a small globe of alabaster, costs $20. It is in Jacobean style, and would be charming in a room furnished with furniture of that period in dull, soft brown wood.

Brocade Party Bags.

Charming bags for afternoon and evening are made of bright brocade, lined with white or plain colored satin or silk, with a little line of ribbon flowers on the inside of the casing which holds the drawstrings. They are fitted with the usual complement of mirror and powder puff.

Black and White Candy Boxes.

Some of the candy shops have attractive boxes covered with black and white striped paper, bound with colored ribbon tied in a big rosette bow at one side. Other pretty black and white boxes are of white, with black pipings, and silhouetted figures in black relief on the covers.

Colored Blouses.

A charming blouse of rose-colored linen can be bought for $2. It is suitable to wear with any dark suit for mornings. It is simply made, and is trimmed with a few tucks at each side of the front closing.

Stocking Pantalettes.

A novelty is white silk stockings with three little frills above the ankles in simulation of pantalettes. These frills are of silk edged with lace.

Blue Silk Bags.

Handbags of navy blue silk, well-made, with little silver clasps around the silk handles, cost $1.95. These bags are neatly lined with figured silk, and contain a tiny coin purse in a little pocket.

SOCIETY CELEBRATING MERRY CARNIVAL OF HALLOWEEN

Many Country House Parties Over Election Day—Women of Social Prominence to Take Active Part in Horse Show—Several Smart Town Weddings This Week—A Slump in Engagements.

HALLOWEEN, in a way, marks the beginning every year of the social season for the younger set, who will soon monopolize the early Winter days and nights with freshness and charm. If it were not for the rejuvenating effects of the débutantes each season, society would present a sad spectacle in time. The younger set have awakened life at Tuxedo during the week-end, with the annual autumnal ball and numerous festivities in progress, and they will shortly descend upon New York society.

Just now is the time for the merry carnival of hobgoblins, brownies, witches, owls and bats, who have been impatiently waiting for their annual reunion. The old tricks seem to have a new interest each year, just as the old love story is ever new. There is always some one for whom it is a "first" time, both in tricks and love.

Strange to relate, there has been a slump in engagements this year so far. Nobody can quite account for it. In past seasons, after a Summer generally propitious to the art, there has been a large number of engagements announced in society's ranks, really many more, often, than during the Spring, after a season of indoor festivities.

Another precedent has been set by the large number of young men, born and bred in New York, who are marrying girls from other cities. Hardly a day passes but that the name of some New Yorker is mentioned as bridegroom in the chronicle of the daily news.

On the other hand, there have been no notable alliances between American girls and foreign nobility, with few exceptions, since the European war began. Yet the war has certainly brought about many international alliances of a quieter sort, which could hardly result in anything else, when the manhood and womanhood of the warring nations work hand in hand with the flower of youth of a great neutral country in deeds of mercy and charity.

Every now and then comes a cabled message of the romance existing between some of those who are giving their services to the French, English, and Belgians in relief or hospital work. One of the most recent engagements announced from Paris was that of Miss Yvonne Terlink, member of a well-known Brussels family, and Edward H. Townsend, son of Mrs. James M. Townsend of 5?5 Park Avenue. Mr. Townsend met Miss Terlink, a refugee, while engaged in ambulance work. Then there was Miss Emily E. Sloane, second daughter of Henry T. Sloane, who, shortly after she had gone abroad in the interest of the Lafayette Fund, became engaged to Baron de la Grange of the French Aviation Corps, and they were married last month in Paris.

There are many others who have gone abroad on mercy who have met their fate in the war zone. It is said that the bird life goes on much as usual under the continual boom of shot and shell. Seemingly the war has no depreciable effect on engagements and marriages, rather to the contrary. The society sheets of England nowadays devote pages to marriages arranged between the daughters and sons of the nation, and war marriages attract as much attention almost at the big churches in London as the approach of a Zeppelin.

THE moderate weather is keeping lots of people in the country, and sending town folk, who have already opened their houses, to the country clubs. The week-end exodus has been unusually large, owing to the Hallowe'en frivolities at the clubs in the metropolitan zone, and the many house parties being held over Election Day.

The Ardsley Club held its costume dance on Friday night, and last night the gayeties of the hobgoblin night were on at the Sleepy Hollow Club, beginning with a harvest dinner and closing with a dance. The hunting colony on Long Island, especially at Meadow Brook, is enjoying brisk gallops these mornings, with well-known society women chasing foxes to earth.

Women will take an active part in this year's Horse Show, which is to open on Nov. 6 in Madison Square Garden. For the famous Waldorf-Astoria challenge cup their entries outnumber those of the men. Among those who are to exhibit their horses are Mrs. Payne Whitney, Mrs. Barger Wallach, Mrs. James Cox Brady, daughter of the new Earl of Limerick; Mrs. Harry La Montagne, Mrs. F. Ambrose Clark, Mrs. William R. Coe, Mrs. John Howes Burton, Miss Adele S. Colgate, whose mother was the Countess of Strafford; Mrs. J. Macy Willets, Mrs. Herbert Wadsworth of Genesee, Mrs. E. B. McLean of Washington, D. C., Miss Clemence Crafts, daughter of Professor James M. Crafts of Harvard University; Mrs. Philip A. Clark of Newport, Miss Isabella Wanamaker of Philadelphia, Miss Marion du Pont of Montpelier, Va., Mrs. Herbert L. Camp, Mrs. Catharine Westinghouse Fletcher, and Mrs. Paul Moore.

The personnel of the parterre row during the coming opera season will remain the same as last year. The boxes affected by mourning have already been mentioned in these columns. The correct list of boxholders is always issued a few days before the opening of the opera. Mrs. Henry M. Flagler will be seen at certain performances, and Mr. and Mrs. Perry Belmont have rented a box for some of the Monday performances. Mr. and Mrs. Belmont passed the season at Newport, and will return to Washington, D. C., on Nov. 16, opening their house there for the Winter. The box owned by Mrs. Vanderbilt, who is in deep mourning for her son, Alfred G. Vanderbilt, will be shared this Winter by Mr. and Mrs. C. Oliver Iselin, Charles E. Sampson, John D. Beals, William B. Thompson, and Mr. and Mrs. Dallas Bache Pratt.

SOCIETY is still in an unsettled state and the formalities of the season will not begin much before the middle of the month.

Indoor ice skating is to be the novelty of the season, and before the season is over everybody will be skating. For a time society was wondering what possible recreation could be devised for the Winter season, to take the place of the dancing craze. Now it has come, and society is as proud of the promising outlook as a child with a new toy. There is no sport which sets off the feminine charm to such advantage as skating, and it lends itself wonderfully to costuming effects, besides the thrilling and novel figures cut by professionals, who will come into their own now without being obliged to travel to Canada. It may soon be possible for hostesses to give exhibitions of indoor skating in their ballrooms.

Many visitors are in town now. The Brazilian Ambassador and Mme. da Gama, also Mme. de Riano, wife of the Spanish Ambassador, are here. Mrs. Walter Brooks, Jr., gave a small dinner one night last week for her mother, Mrs. E. T. Stotesbury. Mrs. French Vanderbilt came down from Newport for a visit. Mr. and Mrs. Griswold A. Thompson have returned from the Virginia Hot Springs.

The Misses Anderson, daughters of General Robert Anderson, arrived here last week, after three years' residence in Europe, and will be in Washington during the Winter. Mr. and Mrs. Francis Burrall Hoffman plan to spend a month in Havana, Cuba, this Winter, with their son, Albert L. Hoffman, who is representing one of the big New York banks there. Young Mr. Hoffman recently gave a large dinner and theatre party at Havana, which is very gay now.

Mr. and Mrs. James Scarbrough Newell of 410 Park Avenue are giving a tea today in honor of Mrs. Robert Wood Johnson, whose engagement to John William Dennis of London was recently announced. Mr. Dennis is an ex-Mayor of the City of Westminster. Their marriage will take place on Wednesday. Mr. and Mrs. Robert Graves are giving a reception today at The Garage at Mineola, L. I. Mr. and Mrs. McDougall Hawkes will give a breakfast on Election Day at their villa at Fairfield, Conn., following the meet of the Fairfield County Beagles.

Mr. and Mrs. Jay Gould have taken Gunton Hall at Lakewood, N. J., for a Winter residence. Mr. and Mrs. F. Grand d'Hauteville have leased Mrs. Warner M. Leeds's house, 11 East Sixty-fifth Street, for the season. Mrs. Anson Phelps Stokes has taken a house and cottage at Ridgefield, Conn., for next Summer.

ANNOUNCEMENTS are being made for the subscription dances of the season. One of the new and interesting series is to be known as the Thursday Seniors, and they will be held on Dec. 16, Jan. 13, and Feb. 3, at Sherry's. The invitations have just been sent out. These dances are for young married people and girls who have been out at least two years, and will be small and early. They will stop promptly at 12:30 o'clock. The patronesses are Mrs. Charles Bradley, Mrs. B. Ogden Chisolm, Mrs. Richard C. Colt, and Mrs. Charles H. Mellon.

The first of the Three Dances, to be held at the Plaza on Nov. 26, will be a dinner dance, and the other meetings of this subscription organization are to be held on Jan. 4 and Feb. 8.

BIRTHS in the ranks of society have been of unusual interest during the last week. A cablegram received on Friday by Henry Clews announced the arrival of an infant son at the Paris home of his son and daughter-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Clews, Jr. The child is to be called Henry Clews, 4th. Mr. and Mrs. Clews received many congratulations, and the cables flashed congratulatory messages to the parents. Mrs. Clews was formerly Mrs. Robert Goelet, and she was married to Mr. Clews last December. Since that time they have lived in Paris, where they are as well known in the art world as in New York. Mrs. Clews was Miss Elsie Whelen of Philadelphia before her first marriage. She received her final decree of divorce from Robert Goelet a few months before her marriage to Mr. Clews.

All week Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., were being congratulated on the birth of a son, their third child, and a grandson of former President Roosevelt. The child was born at the Roosevelt town house, 165 East Seventy-fourth Street. Grace Green Roosevelt, their first child, was born in August, 1911, and Theodore Roosevelt, 3d, was born in June, 1914. Mrs. Roosevelt was formerly Miss Eleanor B. Alexander. The daughter has inherited much of her mother's beauty.

A son was born last week to Prince and Princess Miguel de Braganza, and the cabled message announcing the fact was received by Mrs. Jean H. E. Saint Cyr, mother of the Princess, who was formerly Miss Anita Stewart of New York.

Mr. and Mrs. E. Kenneth Hadden of 7 East Seventy-sixth Street have been the recipient of congratulations on the birth of a son. The child is a grandson of Mrs. Stephen G. Williams and of Mr. and Mrs. Harold F. Hadden.

A daughter was born on Thursday to Mr. and Mrs. Robert Tighe McGusty at the town house of Mrs. McGusty's mother, Mrs. Edwin H. Weatherbee. Mrs. McGusty was formerly Miss Henrietta C. Weatherbee, and her marriage took place last October.

INTEREST in the débutantes was heightened by the week-end gayeties at Tuxedo. The entertainments arranged for them will soon commence.

Mrs. Otto Kahn of 8 East Sixty-eighth Street will give a coming-out reception for her daughter, Miss Maud E. Kahn, late in December. No date has been set as yet. Mrs. Wilbert Bloodgood is to give an afternoon dance for her débutante daughter, Miss Rosalie Bloodgood, on Nov. 20, to be followed by a dinner. The dance will be held in the garden in the rear of the house at 49 East Thirty-fourth Street. The dinner dance for Miss Elizabeth Stuyvesant Howard, daughter of Mrs. Thomas H. Howard of The Crags, Hyde Park, Dutchess County, N. Y., will be held at Sherry's on Tuesday, Dec. 28.

Mrs. Harold Brown has arranged to give a dance on Jan. 6, at Sherry's, for her débutante niece, Miss Audrey Hoffman, daughter of Mrs. Norrie Sellar by a former marriage. Mrs. Albert H. Wiggin will give a dinner dance on Dec. 23, at her home, 521 Park Avenue, for her daughter, Miss Muriel Wiggin.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Danforth of 10 West Fifty-third Street are to give a reception, followed by a dance, on Nov. 26, for their daughter, Miss Josephine B. Danforth. Mr. and Mrs. Thomas A. Buckner are giving a tea on Saturday afternoon, Nov. 27, at Brentmere, their country house at Riverdale-on-Hudson, for their daughter, Miss Mary Olive Buckner, to be followed by dancing and a buffet supper.

Mrs. Francis W. Murray will introduce her daughter, Miss Gertrude L. Murray, at a reception on Dec. 1 at her home, 32 West Thirty-ninth Street. Mrs. Edward W. Packard is to give a tea dance on Dec. 3 at Sherry's for her daughter, Miss Muriel Oakes. Mrs. Albert Rathbone will introduce her daughter, Miss Peggy Rathbone, at a tea dance, to be held on Dec. 28, which is to be followed by a dinner and theatre party.

The coming-out reception for Miss Genevieve Clendenin, which was to have been held yesterday by her mother, Mrs. Joseph Clendenin, at her home in Ardsly-on-Hudson, was abandoned owing to a death in the family and the invitations were recalled. Miss Elizabeth Wesley Luce, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Gilbert of Pelham Manor, is to make her début this season. Miss Luce is the great-granddaughter of Edward B. Wesley and related to prominent New York and Massachusetts families, being a descendant of Samuel Provost, the first Episcopalian Bishop of New York.

THERE are several interesting weddings scheduled for the week, three of the most important town nuptials falling on the same day.

Miss Marie Tailer, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. Lee Tailer, and S. Bryce Wing, son of Mr. and Mrs. L. Stuart Wing, will be married on Wednesday in St. James's Church, with a reception afterward at the home of the bride's parents, 16 East Seventy-second Street.

Miss Tailer has not been entertaining for her bridal attendants, as she is still in mourning for her grandfather. Mr. Wing gave his farewell bachelor dinner on Tuesday night. The reception is to be confined to relatives and a small number of intimate friends.

The wedding of Miss Matilda Bigelow, daughter of Mrs. Edward M. Padelford, and Herbert C. Pell, Jr., son of Mr. and Mrs. Herbert C. Pell, is to be celebrated on Wednesday in the Church of the Heavenly Rest. The ceremony is to be performed by Bishop Darlington of Harrisburg, Penn., assisted by the Rev. Herbert Shipman. A reception and breakfast will follow at the Hotel St. Regis, where Mr. and Mrs. Padelford reside.

Miss Bigelow will be attended by Miss Priscilla White of Baltimore, Md. Clarence C. Pell will be his brother's best man. Midshipman Anson Bigelow, U. S. N., will give his sister in marriage. The ushers will include Percy R. Pyne, 2d, A. Eugene Gallatin, Marshall Kernochan, Gordon MacDonald, Henry Coleman Drayton, Pierre Lorillard, and Pierre L. Barbey. On Thursday evening Mr. Pell gave his bachelor dinner at the Knickerbocker Club.

Miss Helen Stearns, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Louis Stearns, and Lyall Dean, son of Mrs. Charles E. Bigelow of 251 West Seventy-second Street, are to be married at 4 o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, in St. George's Church, Stuyvesant Square, with the subsequent reception at the bride's home.

Mrs. Weld M. Stevens will be her sister's matron of honor, and the other attendants will include Mrs. Le Roy K. Howe, and the Misses Mercedes de Zaldo, Dorothy Mills, and Dorothy Bigelow.

Emerson Bigelow will be best man, and the ushers are to be Frank E. Barnard, Allan Lefferts, George B. Yerkes, David F. Goodnow, Ward E. Pearson, and Joseph K. Hooker of Hartford, Conn.

After their wedding trip, Mr. Dean and his bride will make their home in Pelham Manor.

In Philadelphia, on Wednesday, Miss Hope Truxton Beale, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Edward F. Beale, will be married to Oliver Eaton Cromwell, son of Mrs. E. T. Stotesbury by a former marriage. Miss Beale is the second of the bridal attendants at the Duke-Biddle wedding to become a bride.

On Thursday, in St. James's Church, Miss Katharine Hutton, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Hutton of 686 Park Avenue, will be married to Thomas F. Plunkett of Pittsfield, Mass. Miss Amy C. Hutton is to be her sister's only attendant. James Rockwell of Taunton, Mass., is to be best man.

The wedding of Miss Jane Ogden of Albany and Frederick C. Tanner, chairman of the Republican State Committee, is to be solemnized on Saturday, in the State Street Presbyterian Church at Albany. Little Olive Whitman, daughter of Governor and Mrs. Whitman, is to act as flower girl. United States Senator James W. Wadsworth, Jr., will be among the ushers.

Plans have been completed for the marriage of Miss Katharine S. Sands, daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Robert A. Sands, and John M. P. Thatcher, son of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas M. Thatcher of Somerset, Ky., which is to take place on Wednesday, Nov. 17, in the chapel of St. Bartholomew's Church. A small reception will follow at the home of the bride's parents, 101 East Thirty-ninth Street.

Miss Sands is to be attended by Mrs. William S. Fairchild (Miss Cammann,) and the Misses Vera Cravath, Elizabeth P. Thatcher, a sister of the bridegroom, and Olive A. Tripp.

Robert T. Swaine is to be best man, and the ushers will be Douglas M. Moffat, Karl T. Frederick, J. Hampden Dougherty, Walter S. Gifford, D. Chester Noyes, and Edward V. Sands, a brother of the bride.

THE war relief work, expressed in entertainments and sales, will begin shortly. On Nov. 16 a sale of toys will start at the old Knickerbocker Club building, the proceeds to go to the Relief Fund of France. These toys, thousands of them, have been made by wounded and crippled soldiers in France and have been brought to this country at the instigation of Mrs. William Astor Chanler and other members of the Lafayette Fund Committee. The list of patronesses is a long and distinguished one.

On Tuesday evening, Nov. 23, at Sherry's, the annual subscription dance for the benefit of the Children's Club of St. Ambrose will be held, with many interesting features. Miss Lois Martin of 178 East Sixty-fourth Street is receiving applications for tickets at $3 each. Many prominent women are acting as patronesses, and the committee in charge is made up of Mrs. Stephen Clark, Mrs. George Whitney, Mrs. Joseph Seligman, Mrs. Arthur O. Choate, and the Misses Ina Kissel, Genevieve Sanford, and Mary Tweed.

and employes, including all police and health officers and employes paid by the city, that does not constitute a declaration that, if their removal is not for proper cause, the courts may be deprived of the right to review the validity of the removal. On the contrary, the power which is granted does not confer the right to interfere with the judicial powers or authority. They constitute a State function, they are matters of State concern, and certainly, without legislative authority, cannot be exercised by the municipalities. The right of the Legislature to deny the power of court review has never been questioned, yet it has never heretofore undertaken to exercise that right, and there is nothing in the Constitution which in any manner limits its plenary jurisdiction in regard to the subject of court review.

Moreover, even if any municipality should undertake to prohibit the right of court review the Legislature may, by a general provision of law, applicable to all cities, confer the right, and its action would be controlling. Hence, so far as our teachers, policemen and firemen are concerned, their present status will remain unchanged. It would have been manifestly beyond the true function of a Constitution to have undertaken expressly to confer therein the right of review. That would have been as much out of place as it would have been to have undertaken to make specific procedural enactments as to a thousand and other details which may relate to the whole or a part of the inhabitants of our cities.

More Intelligent Taxation.

The new taxation article contains provisions which are certain to bring about a more intelligent rule of taxation and of the collection of taxes. It will insure uniformity. It contains a valuable guarantee that the power of taxation shall never be surrendered, suspended, or contracted away except as to the securities of the State or a civil division thereof, and that henceforth no exemption from taxation shall be granted except by general laws and upon the affirmative vote of two-thirds of all the members elected to each house of the Legislature.

Future Amendments.

Provision is also made for the future amendment of the Constitution by means of amendments proposed in the Legislature. It requires that no such amendment shall pass until it has been printed and upon the desks of the members in its final form for at least five calendar legislative days prior to agreement thereon. This enables the public to know what measures affecting our organic law are proposed, and will enable the press to direct its attention and that of the electors of the State to such measures.

It also provides for a consideration of any proposed amendment by the two houses convened in joint session. After such solemn conference, which is certain to attract public notice, the proposal shall be considered and acted upon by the Assembly and Senate separately. This will make the important act of amending the fundamental law one of deliberation, and will tend to prevent ill-considered measures from being submitted to the people.

Perhaps the most important amendment is that which, for the first time in our history, makes it possible for a citizen to contest in the Supreme Court the validity of an election upon any amendment or proposed Constitution or question submitted to the electors of the State, and the determination whether the amendment, Constitution or question has received the number of votes requisite for its adoption. Under the decisions of our courts, even if an election were absolutely void, even though it were obtainted by manifest fraud, there is no possible method by which such invalidity or fraud may be tested. It is, therefore, possible by means of fraud to foist upon the people a Constitution which they do not desire, or by a fraudulent count to defeat a Constitution which they in fact desire. It would be equally possible to impose upon the State enormous bonded obligations against the express will of the people solely because the courts have hitherto deemed themselves powerless to intervene against the consequences of illegality and fraud. Unless such a provision is placed in the Constitution the time may come when revolution is inevitable.

Legislative Apportionment.

The subject of legislative apportionment is one which is to be submitted as an independent proposition at the coming election. It has no relation to the matters thus far discussed. In fact, it makes no material change from the provisions of the present Constitution dealing with the subject. If it is defeated then the present Constitution continues in force. The only differences between them are that under the new Constitution future apportionments may be had under the Federal census, thus obviating the expense of an independent State enumeration, which amounts to upward of $500,000, and that, although under the present Constitution no two counties of the State shall have more than one-half the Senatorial representation in the Legislature, the proposed Constitution provides that no two counties, as they were constituted in 1894, shall have more than one-half of such representation.

The claim is made that under both of these Constitutions there is a discrimination against the City of New York. As a practical proposition, there is no danger that, during the next twenty years, there will arise any possibility for appealing to this provision. It has always been our policy that, in the matter of apportionment, geographical considerations are to be considered as well as population. There has been no apportionment since 1777 that has not recognized that dual principle. Besides, apportionment has never proceeded upon mere population, but solely upon citizen population. Aliens have never been a factor for very obvious reasons.

Except, therefore, that the new Constitution enables the State to save $500,000 every time an apportionment takes place, the difference between the present Constitution and the proposed Constitution is that of tweedledee and tweedledum.

There has been some criticism that the Constitution should have contained provisions in addition to those which were adopted. That affords however, no reason for defeating the good work that has been done. If there is merit in such omitted measures, then it will be very easy to add them to the Constitution by amendment by the action of two successive Legislatures and a vote of the electors. But why, because of disappointment with what has not been done, shall all of these great constructive measures, which are concededly of inestimable value to the people of the State, be rejected, with the certainty that a like opportunity to improve the framework of our government will not be afforded for another twenty years? Why shall that which is good be cast aside because it is not better, when by doing so we have the certainty of living under a Constitution which is concededly worse than that which is now proposed?

THE WEEK ON THE VARIOUS WAR FRONTS IN EUROPE

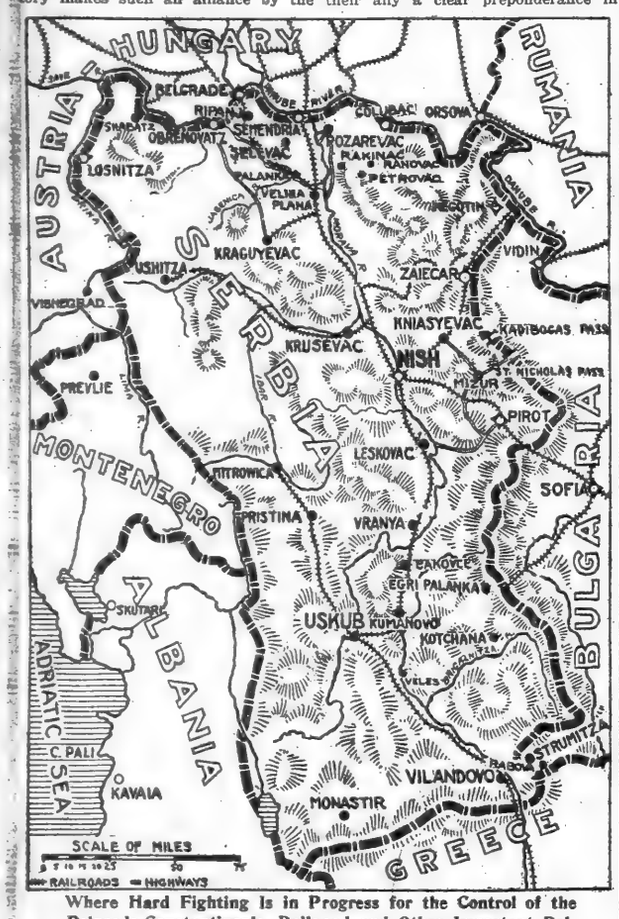
Operations of Contending Armies in the Balkans Still Overshadow in Importance the Happenings on Other Fronts---Continued Success of Russians Against Teutons in Eastern Theatre of War---Formidable Italian Offensive Movement Against the Austrians---Lull in Fighting on Western Front.

By a Military Expert.

THE dominant points of interest are still, as they have been for the last two weeks, in the Balkans. Nor is the public less interested in the diplomatic side than in the operations in Serbia.

Greece and Rumania, in spite of all the pressure that is being exerted on them, in spite of offers of much coveted territory, still persist in maintaining their neutrality. In this, there is, at the present time at least, much reason. None of the Balkan States can afford to guess wrong. Greece, Rumania, and Bulgaria must join with the winning side or practically cease to exist when peace is made.

Bulgaria has made her choice secure in her belief of Teuton victory. Ferdinand is known as a very astute though altogether unscrupulous politician and naturally his decision by itself is enough to make both Greece and Rumania hesitate. Public sympathy in both States is strongly pro-Ally. Racial ties with Italy makes a Rumanian alliance with the Teutons a nearly impossible conception. Past history makes such an alliance by the



Where Hard Fighting Is in Progress for the Control of the Belgrade-Constantinople Railroad and Other Important Balkan Lines of Communications.

Greeks equally hard to conceive. At the same time, once a choice is made, national existence is thrown into the balance with national ambition.

The Teuton successes in Russia, without meaning as they are, are, nevertheless, of sufficient importance in the amount of territory occupied to appeal strongly to the Balkan imagination and, cleverly and thoroughly advertised by the German publicity department, cannot but exercise a great influence on the smaller States now hesitating between peace and war.

The Allies in the west have shown no indication of being able to maintain a consistent offensive. On the contrary, to the Balkan eyes, they seem to be held strictly in their trenches, with an occasional small advance for a mile or two. In the east the Balkan peoples have witnessed the driving back of Russia from the Dunajec and the Carpathians to the Dvina, the Niemen, the Styr, and the Strypa. They have seen a vast area of the richest and most populous section of Russia occupied and held securely by the Teutons, while Russia is struggling in the Pripet marshes. Except for a negligible strip east of the Vosges in Alsace and an equally negligible strip east of the Strypa in Galicia, the Teutons are everywhere waging war in the enemy's territory. Is it any wonder that Greece and Rumania hesitate before taking a step from which there is no retreat? Until the Allies have demonstrated their ability to do something, both Greece and Rumania are justified in holding back at all costs.

Such a chance is now presented to the Allies in Serbia. They have been caught napping in spite of the fact that reasonable foresight should have led them to be prepared and much Serbian territory is now in the hands of the Teutons and the Bulgars. But it is not yet too late for the Allies to show their strength if they move quickly and have sufficient courage. The only influence that can prove strong enough to move the wavering States is to land a force at Saloniki of sufficient strength to engage, with the aid of the Serbians, all the Teutons and all the Bulgars that can be thrown into that field. That should not prove an impossible task and it can be done without any great weakening of the other fronts.

A brief analysis of the numbers now in Serbia will give an idea of what is needed:

The Teutons have about 200,000 men moving south from the Danube and the Save. The probable number of Bulgarians can be estimated with fair accuracy. The total population of Bulgaria is somewhere between 4,000,000 and 5,000,000. This means, figuring on the usual 10 per cent. basis, that the maximum Bulgarian force in the field would be about 500,000 men.

But Bulgaria has just emerged from her second war in four years and these two wars seriously reduced the percentage of fighting troops to total population. It is certain, then, that Bulgaria's strength cannot be more than from 400,000 to 450,000 men. And this number is not all available for the enterprise against the Serbs. Rumania is seething and may side with the Allies at any time. Greece is in exactly the same situation. Russia is only too ready to land troops on the Black Sea coast. Therefore, as an absolutely necessary precaution, the northern and southern frontiers together with the eastern coast line must be guarded.

For this purpose about half of the Bulgarian Army is needed, leaving for the Serbian invasion not more than 250,000 men at the outside. The Serbian Army, cut down as it has been by war and disease, numbers not more than 250,000, giving the Teutons and their ally a clear preponderance in numbers of at least 200,000. To save Serbia the Allies must neutralize this.

But neutralization of the Serbian Armies is not sufficient to bring assistance either from Greece or from Rumania. Both these countries are more interested immediately in being adequately protected from invasion than in gifts of territory. And the Allies' chances of enlisting their aid would be much better if they were prepared to give such protection instead of trying to bribe one with Cyprus now and the other with promises of future territory should they gain the decision. This means that the Allies must land at Saloniki, at Enos, or at Dedeaghatch not only enough troops to nullify the attempt to cut through Serbia and free for Teuton use the Berlin-Constantinople Railroad but enough completely to engage the attention of the Bulgarians throughout Bulgaria so that invasion of the countries on their north and south will be absolutely impossible. Then Greece and Rumania may move.

This campaign would require about 400,000 men—150,000 strictly for Serbian defense, the balance for other operations against Bulgaria. The question arises then: Where is this great body of men to come from? France certainly is not able to supply them. It remains for England to furnish the greater part, and the Gallipoli Peninsula would seem to be the logical place from which to send them, for from there the sending would require the least time.

As pointed out last week, the Gallipoli operations have already justified their existence. At the same time, as far as positive results are concerned, the entire movement is a failure. The Allies have not advanced, and cannot advance, apparently beyond their present position which they have occupied for months. But the British are too stubborn, too senselessly proud, to admit their defeat by withdrawing a part of their forces to send them to aid Serbia, no matter how great the necessity may be.

There are, of course, other considerations. There would be a temporary loss in prestige before the world, and a certain number of the Turks would be released for operations elsewhere. But as practical considerations these have little weight. Rumania, separated from Turkey by the full width of Bulgaria, would care little about the release of the Turkish forces now on Gallipoli. Long before these forces could reach a point where they could be of service the British would have landed in Saloniki and stemmed the tide of the Teuton-Bulgar invasion.

If such a move brought Rumanian aid in its wake, it would be well worth while. Utterly regardless of Greece, Rumania is the decisive factor in the Balkans. Even though the population occupying the territory recently acquired through the last war is as yet unassimilated and probably could not be considered in our estimate of numbers, the Rumanians could nevertheless throw into the field a force thoroughly organized, equipped, and drilled greater than the combined strength of any two of the other Balkan States and almost as great as the forces of Greece, Serbia, and Bulgaria combined.

In all this, however, it must be realized, as stated last week, that no decision can possibly be reached on this front. No matter how glowing the reports from any source may be, no matter what claims that source may make as to the results to be achieved, a decision can be reached nowhere else than on the western or the eastern front—in France or in Russia. The reasons are simple enough.

With the line to Constantinople securely held, with a steady flow of ammunition and supplies to the Turks and Gallipoli, even with the Turkish reserves not now under arms equipped and supplied from German factories and made ready to take the field, what has been accomplished other than the defeat of the effort of the Allies to give Russia an outlet from the Black Sea to the Mediterranean? An attempt to invade Egypt—even India—has been mentioned. But the idea is impossible. The Central Powers have not the men nor can they get them.

Man power is one thing factories cannot produce. Even as this article is being written Hindenburg is calling from Riga for reinforcements that can come only from Mackensen; and Mackensen is likewise calling for men who can come only from Hindenburg. The line in the west is stretched to its elastic limit; the line against Italy is being pressed to the point that Gorizia, Trieste, and the road to Vienna are in jeopardy. Where then can the additional men needed for a campaign outside of Europe be found? The idea certainly cannot be said to hold water.

It may well be asked then what was Germany's object in beginning a movement which from its very nature is of necessity indecisive and which when accomplished at enormous expense leads nowhere.

The principal object seems to be political. A review of the past six weeks of the war will show that on the western front the German line is held, at least in parts, by the minimum number of men possible and that this line is not strong enough in reserves to withstand a concentrated artillery attack without cracking. The German lines west of Loos and in the Champagne were admitted to be the most nearly invulnerable of any part of their western front. Eight months ago the French hammered at the Champagne line for two months with no effect. And only recently both fronts gave way in three days' time.

On the eastern front, during these weeks, the Teutons have been unable to advance anywhere against the Russian lines. On the other hand, it has been Russia who has seized the initiative, except on the short line from Dvinsk to Riga, and who has made the only gains worthy of mention. Between Volhynia and the Pruth a succession of quick, hard blows enabled Russia to advance from the Sereth to the west bank of the Strypa, inflicting heavy losses and capturing nearly 150,000 men.

In the Balkans, already seething, it was not impossible that the opinion of German prowess, gained by the impressive advance from the Dunajec to the Pripet marshes, would be lost by the complete check. Should the view prevail that Germany had reached her limit all of the Balkan States would turn to the Allies and Rumania and Bulgarian guns would blast open the gates between the Black and Mediterranean Seas. Something had to be done. Something startling and dramatic. Something that would stir the imagination of the world and at the same time illustrate to the wavering Balkan States what the power of the mailed fist was.

In no other field could so much be accomplished in so little time as in Serbia, where resistance was sure to be a minimum. Serbia, too, held out the additional advantage of being a complete answer to the English operations in Gallipoli. So it was decided that Serbia was to receive the blow—and it may be mentioned in passing, coincident with Teuton successes come, in a roundabout way from Berlin, intimations that Germany is willing to talk terms of peace.

Another point that may prove worth remembering is Bulgaria's position. Ferdinand is one of the most astute but at the same time one of the most unscrupulous monarchs in Europe. Bulgaria, like the other Balkan States, must be on the winning side or sacrifice its national independence. If allied support enables Serbia to get the upper hand, will Ferdinand forsake the Kaisers and ask the Allies for terms?

In the military field proper the week has seen rapid and important developments. The Teuton advance from the north has continued steadily, the rate being about the same as last week. The Serbian resistance has been extremely stubborn, but superior numbers have made it unavailing. The Serbs, however, have not reached the line that is generally considered their main line of defense, the line in the mountains through Kruschewatz, Kraljewo, and Tschatschak. The Morava Valley, however, offers a very simple line of advance as far as Velika Plana. Once that point is passed the road to Nish becomes more and more difficult. For this two-thirds of the entire distance, therefore, the Germans will find that although the Serbians cannot halt them, they will do them considerable damage and greatly swell the casualty lists.

The Bulgars, driving westward, have effected a junction with the Germans in the extreme northeastern section of Serbia at Ljubicevac and have thereby cleared the Danube for traffic from Austria into Turkey. By using the river, supplies can go by water to Somobit and Rushchuk and thence by rail to the main Oriental road from Sofia to Constantinople. On the eastern Serbian front the Bulgars have had a week of successes that seriously endanger Nish. Their advance has been maintained by all three columns which are moving toward that centre, one down the valley of the Timok River, which leads to the railroad junction of Paratschin, one along the road that comes into Nish from the north through Kniaschevatz, and the third on the main road from Sofia, coming by way of Pirot. The northern Serbian situation is truly desperate, and it does not seem within the bounds of possibility that the Bulgars can be prevented from taking Nish.

The first of the columns mentioned has taken Zajecar, the only fortified post in the Timok Valley. The second column has, it is reported, taken Kniaschevatz. This is the most perilous to the Serbs of any success so far attained. It is only thirty miles from Nish and is so far in advance of Pirot, a strongly fortified town about thirty-five miles south which has been taken by the third Bulgarian army, that sooner or later any advance beyond it will force the Serbians in front of Pirot to fall back. In this particular section the opposing lines are generally semicircular, with the Bulgars operating on the interior and therefore the shorter lines. This gives them a double advantage in that not only are the lines shorter but the Bulgarians greatly outnumber their opponents.

The great danger to the Serbs in all of this is that the present operations of the Teutonic allies, if successful—and there is every likelihood that they will be—must inevitably cut off all Serbian forces in the northeast corner—that is in that section of Serbia included between the Belgrade-Sofia Railroad and Austria, Rumania, and Bulgaria. The only hope for them lies in the ability of the Allies to send sufficient men and guns to roll up the Bulgarian flank in the south and take the main Bulgarian army in the rear.

The two essential elements in such an allied movement are time and supplies. Whatever is to be done must be done now, as soon it will be too late. The question of supplies is vital and involves problems that will tax to the utmost the abilities of the Allies' transport facilities. The Bulgarians are operating with very short lines and good railroads in the rear. The sending of reinforcements to various parts of their line is reduced to the simplest possible terms. The Allies are said to have in Southern Serbia now 150,000 French and about 15,000 British, about four full army corps—but it is hardly possible that these corps have their full complement of artillery and shell. They have formed a junction with the Southern Serbian army and have met and defeated the Bulgarian army in front of Strumitza. They then moved up along the Saloniki railroad, clearing it for about fifty miles. The Bulgarians, however, have advanced as far west as Uskub and have taken that junction, although it has since been reported that they have been driven out and that the town is again in the hands of the Serbs. The situation in the south is extremely confused and any detailed review of what has happened will be impossible until future operations have clarified things.

In other theatres two battles stand out above all others—that going on in Northern Russia between Dvinsk and Riga and that of the Italians for Gorizia. Von Hindenburg has been battering at the Russians on this line since his failure to trap them in the Vilna sector over a month ago. Dvinsk, Riga, and the valuable section of the railroad between have been on the verge of falling into his hands a number of times, but it does not seem as if he is any nearer to taking them than he was several weeks ago. Certainly only insignificant gains have been made, and these at a loss in men entirely disproportionate. There has been no evidence as yet of Russian shortage of ammunition, at least of ammunition of a calibre that will match the Germans', for it is unlikely that any heavy guns are being used in the attack. General transportation facilities are poor and the character of the country is not favorable to the manoeuvres of anything but light field artillery with possibly larger howitzers at selected points.

On the Isonzo front the Italians have launched an attack against Gorizia that has hemmed that fortress in so that its rapid fall seems inevitable. But both in Trentino and along the Isonzo more has been accomplished in the last ten days than during any month previous. It is sufficient to say now that all entrances from the Trentino into Italy have been thoroughly blocked and the Italians are in a position to drive their attack against the Isonzo line with no thought of an attack in rear.

AN ANALYSIS OF THE KAISER

Baron Beyens, Former Minister at Berlin, Writes Book on the Imperial Mind.

One of the most alert observers at European Chancelleries of the gathering storm of fourteen months ago was Baron Beyens, the Belgian Minister at Berlin, whose official communications are to be found among the diplomatic documents published by THE NEW YORK TIMES.

The Baron has now presented his personal impressions of the Kaiser and his sons in an intimate unofficial volume entitled "L'Allemagne Avant La Guerre," ("Germany Before the War." G. Van Oest et Cie., Brussels and Paris.)

Baron Beyens believes that for many years the Kaiser honestly thought that he was preparing his war machine so that he could absolutely enforce peace on the world, but that finally the temptation to use the monster he had created in order to secure for Germany by force what he had long labored to secure by diplomacy became too great to be withstood and he yielded to the dictates of the war party in a moment of weakness. Since then he had been "un malade"—unsound.

The Kaiser also developed a fixed idea; it was that when the crisis came the other European nations would leave France to be dealt with alone. Baron Beyens writes:

"It must be stated distinctly that William II. has always hugged the idea that he would only have to fight France, the ancient and irreconcilable enemy. The coming war took to him the form of a simple duel between the republic and the empire. He has long cherished the hope of dividing his adversaries and securing Russian inaction. The Berlin Court never regarded the Franco-Russian alliance as indestructible. The Emperor remarked to me himself, some months before the war, that the views entertained in France of the solidity of the Dual Alliance were illusions; that he was well informed of the real sentiments of the Imperial Court by high Russian personages, who, when passing through Potsdam, made no secret of the side on which their sympathies lay.

"At the Court of Berlin," Baron Beyens remarks, "the recollections that he had ever offended Russia were quite effaced, for the Emperor—it is another trait of his character—quickly forgets the unkindly deeds of which he is the author. He practices the forgiveness of the injuries which he inflicts." At one time he was really quite hurt because French actors and musicians declined to perform in Berlin and wondered why. For some months before the war his attitude had become one of undisguised bitterness.

"In February, 1914, he used in my presence on the night of a court ball, in the course of a conversation in which my friend and fellow-countrymen Baron Lambert took part, an expression more forcible than true—an expression which he was fond of repeating, for he had already used it with other diplomats: 'I have often offered my hand to France; she has given me her answer with kicks.' His bitterness next directed itself to the Parisian Press, which, he said, was attacking Germany day by day in unmeasured language. He ended up in a grave tone by declaring in an emphatic manner, which gave weight to his words, 'that Paris should take care, for it would not be always thus.' Now, when he was thus speaking, the war was already determined in his mind, as if in distant view. What did his language mean? Was it a kind of comedy, of duplicity? Did he feel the need of nursing and accumulating his grievances in order to justify his coming acts?"

"We often find in a King or in a statesman many different men who appear successively at different periods of life. Accumulating years calm or control, in leaders conscious of their responsibilities, the passions of their youth. Maturity and experience dispose them to cast a mistrustful eye on enterprises on which they might else employ their efforts and resources. The opposite of this has been the case with William II. In him the wise and prudent man—of only a relative wisdom and prudence, it is true—has been not the man of mature years but of youth.

"The state of his health—I have heard him say it—may have been the governing factor in a moral degeneration. In spite of the open-air exercise which he took assiduously, or because of the frequent changes and the overstrain which followed from it, his nerves, always on the stretch, were enfeebled. The daily rest of at least an hour in bed each afternoon to which he constrained himself was not sufficient to establish a physical equilibrium. His wrinkled face and gray complexion betrayed the using up of his constitution. The German people, who saw him seldom, were struck with the premature aging of the Kaiser. Who knows, it may be asked, if the diminution of his powers of resistance have not affected his mentality! Physiologists and doctors, accustomed to deal with the interconnection of moral and physical phenomena, would answer in the affirmative. For myself, I do not think that fatigue and over-strain affected his acts greatly. It appears incontestable that his nervous instability has increased in those last times, that his growing irritability has made him more difficult to serve, more impatient for implicit obedience. But his designs have been planned with perfect calmness of mind, and not in that state of unhealthy over-excitement which is too readily attributed to him."

Baron Beyens will hear of nothing which will relieve the Kaiser of the full responsibility for the war, and as to the decisive influence of the Crown Prince he writes:

"That legend may be sent to limbo. The Crown Prince has merited neither that excess of honor nor that indignity.

"In outward appearance a typical officer of the light cavalry—slender in figure, narrow-chested, elegant, especially on horseback. In him the usual type of the Hohenzollerns, the broad shoulders and regular features, seems to be lost. In that very youthful figure the brow slopes back, the features are somewhat lacking in decision, and the eyes do not seem to reveal a lively intelligence. The appearance is deceitful. The Prince is a vigorous officer and a keen sportsman.

"At first sight one sees in him no resemblance to the Emperor, but that is to be found in greater degree in his character. Less instructed, less cultivated, less universal, but equally self-willed, he has inherited his father's impetuosity and his irresistible necessity to pour out his mind freely. A line of creatures of impulse—that is what the Hohenzollerns of today, different indeed from their ancestors, have given to Germany.

"The Prince has the soul of a sabreur, or, at least, he boasts of having it. At an official dinner, finding himself with the wife of an Ambassador of the Triple Entente for partner, he could think of nothing more courteous or more spirituel to talk to her about than his favorite dream of making war and heading a charge of his own regiment."

His bad relations with the Kaiser, his championship of the Military Party, and his pre-war popularity are facts known to everybody, but Baron Beyens comes back to his main thesis:

"To speak of the jealousy of William II., excited by the growing popularity of the Crown Prince, is to misjudge the Emperor. He has too great an idea of his own merit, and can never have had any illusions as to the capacity of his heir. To insinuate that through fear of that popularity, which threatened to drown his own, William II. precipitated events would be to attribute to the Prince an influence which he has never possessed. His bellicose appeals, his warlike ardour, would never have shaken the will of the Emperor if the latter had not decided of his own initiative to go forward and risk the great game whose stakes are the destiny of Europe and Germany."

The five other male members of the Prussian royal family, Baron Beyens describes as "high-born nonentities"—"their horizon is limited to Germany, and of interest in political life in any real sense they have as little as the Crown Prince. They hold themselves as a caste apart, and—

"Their stiff isolation manifests itself above all in their relations with the other German Princes. Whoever has marked them on ceremonial occasions, at marriages, funerals, inauguration of monuments, where the representatives of the ruling and princely houses of the Empire meet, will have been struck by their attitude. They hold themselves together, and make a group apart, as if to impress on the world that they are the dominant race and the others mere supernumeraries or vassals. This high opinion which they have of themselves and of the greatness of their house does not prevent them, however, from unbending sometimes toward certain members of families which have the precious advantage of being related to the Hohenzollerns."

Do the other princely houses in Germany relish the Prussian Imperial attitude? Baron Beyens cannot believe that their present espousal of the Kaiser's cause is entirely free from misgivings, which will become convictions in the war's retrospect:

"It was the brilliant idea of Bismarck, the forger of German unity, to make his work truly popular by tempering it in the blood of a war against a foreign foe. It would be unwise, in my opinion, to attempt to break this bond. Momentarily sundered by an outside force, the rings would weld themselves together again. But in a defeated Germany the confederate Princes, bent low yesterday before the emperor would be perhaps the first to raise their heads tomorrow and to contest with their humiliated Caesar, the omnipotence that he has used so ill."

MAXIM GORKY'S PLEA FOR PEACE.

Maxim Gorky is reported in the Frankfurter Zeitung to have delivered an address to the Russian student organization Swobodnoje Slovo, at Moscow, in which he deprecated Russia's ability to recover from the German blows, in the following language:

"We must have the courage to face without fear the terrible danger in which our Fatherland is at present hovering. It cannot be denied any more, the Russian armies are completely beaten. They are in flight; there can be no talk of an orderly retirement. The superior power of the German Army is clearly proved. Our soldiers will never succeed in holding back the advance of the Germans. It is an absurd and ludicrous idea to comfort the people with hopes of next Spring, in the hope that in the Winter months the internal organization which Russia lacks can be created. It sounds like mockery! A work for decades, is to be done by us in eight months! Germany, too, will not allow the Winter to pass without use; its superiority will be even greater next Spring than now.

"The fruit of the war for Russia may some day be internal deliverance and organization in Russia. The Russian peasant, the Russian people, have not failed in this war. Russia has done more than its allies. The Russian soldier whenever he has had the proper leadership, has always fought bravely and with self-sacrifice, holding his ground and allowing himself to be mowed down by thousands. This has been freely attested also by our enemies. In Russia only the men of the Government and the leaders of the army have failed. It has been shown that in Russia nothing has changed as yet in principle since the Japanese war.

"It is still time for Russia to conclude a cheap and honorable peace. Germany has still, perhaps, an interest in an early peace with Russia. If its soldiers should soon stand in Petrograd, or Moscow, or Kiev, and they will come there, then Germany will no longer be in a hurry for peace. The way to the west will then be open for it, for then the Russian spinal cord will be cut and Russia will slowly bleed to death. Even if the Ministers at Petrograd say that the war will last five years more and that Russia till then will retire as far as the Urals, that is utterly absurd and the Ministers know it. As soon as our foes are in Petrograd, and Kiev, and Moscow, Holy Russia will have ceased to exist."

The Frankfurter Zeitung adds:

"At its conclusion the meeting was broken up by the police. Gorky was summoned to the authorities on the following day, and he was informed that he would not be permitted to agitate again for peace. Only because of Gorky's popularity in Russia at the moment there were no other measures taken against him."

Lace the New Note in Millinery

(One Hat Illustrated)

Fashion has decided that for formal afternoon and evening wear there is nothing quite so effective as hats of lace.

Some of the new models are very lovely, of black chantilly lace frilled loosely over a foundation of gold or silver lace attached to a wired brim. The crowns are of velvet, plain or draped, or perhaps of closely woven gold allover, with a band of fur or a knot of gold or silver flowers.

The shapes are of all sizes and styles. In the sketch is a modified Directoire model of black chantilly with a fur band at the top partly encircled with a wreath of gold flowers and leaves.

It costs 7.50, and there are many others at this interesting price.

An R. and G. Corset Will Give You the New Figure; All Curves and Grace

(An advance model, 1916, illustrated.)

You cannot wear this year's gowns over last year's style of corset; that is, you cannot do this and give to the gown the grace which is its due.

The new figure is charmingly slender, delicately curving at the waistline and slightly rounded at the hips, with the bust raised enough to give the pretty contour which the new frocks and suits demand.

R. and G. Corsets of 1915-16 have been specially constructed to re-shape the figures which the "easy" corsets of a year ago permitted to sag and become thick and awkward. While they are made in many styles to suit the many types of women, they all aim toward the same end—that of giving the new, attractive, gently curving lines.

We have an R. and G. model which will fit YOU perfectly, at 1.00 to 3.50.

THE FIRST-NIGHT CALENDAR.

"THE ETERNAL MAGDALENE"—A modern drama by Robert McLaughlin, bringing Julia Arthur back to the stage, tomorrow night in the Forty-eighth Street Theatre.

"AROUND THE MAP"—A musical play, book and lyrics by C. M. S. McLellan, music by Herman Finck, with Else Alder in the prima donna role, tomorrow night in the New Amsterdam.

"FAIR AND WARMER"—A farce by Avery Hopwood, Tuesday night in the Eltinge.

"HOHEIT TANZT WALZER"—An operetta in German by Leo Ascher; Friday night in the Irving Place.

AFTER several weeks of comparative quiet there will come a flurry this week in the theatres that will bring three new plays to town. In one of them Julia Arthur, a popular actress of ten or twelve years ago, will return to Broadway. Another, a musical play, will introduce Else Alder, a popular Viennese prima donna, here. Down at the Irving Place the German stock company will take a brief excursion into musical comedy.

The drama in which Miss Arthur will return to the stage is called "The Eternal Magdalene." It was written by Robert McLaughlin, a Cleveland theatrical manager, and produced by him there in stock early this season. It immediately attracted the attention of New York producers and Selwyn & Co. and A. H. Woods paid $5,000 in advance royalties for the producing rights. "The Eternal Magdalene" is a modern drama dealing with certain social conditions. It is said to be written in a straightforward, unusually frank manner.

The company chosen to appear with Miss Arthur includes Emmett Corrigan, Lucile Watson, Louise Randolph, Lowell Sherman, Claire Burke, Arnold Lucy, Harry Harwood, Frank Byrne, Alphonse Ethier, William J. Phinney, and E. M. Dresser.

The first performance will be given tomorrow night in the Forty-eighth Street Theatre.

Klaw & Erlanger will make their first musical comedy production of the new season tomorrow night when they will present in the New Amsterdam Theatre a piece described as a musical globe trot and entitled "Around the Map." The book and lyrics are by C. M. S. McLellan, the librettist of "The Pink Lady" and "Oh! Oh! Delphine." The music is by Herman Finck, musical director of the Palace Theatre, London, whose song, "In the Shadows," sung in every apartment several years ago, is perhaps his best known work in America.

An interesting feature of the performance will be the first New York appearance of Else Alder, who comes from Johann Strauss Theatre, Vienna, where she has sung the prima donna roles in some of the most popular of the Viennese light operas. Then there will be William Norris, Georgia O'Ramey, Robert Pitkin, Hazel Cox, Tyler Brooke, Prudence O'Shea, Fred Nice, Louise Groody, Irving Brooks, and Majorie Gateson in other principal roles.

The piece is said to be unusually handsomely mounted even for a New Amsterdam production. The fact that Joseph Urban designed and painted its thirteen scenes commends it. Then the indefatigable and resourceful Julian Mitchell drilled the chorus and the ensemble numbers.

As the title suggests, the plot spins the characters around the map, and Berlin, Port Arthur, San Francisco, and New York are among the widely separated cities visited. The party embark on their journey as the result of a wager of a half million francs.

A new farce by Avery Hopwood entitled "Fair and Warmer" will be presented Tuesday night in the Eltinge Theatre by Selwyn & Co. Mr. Hopwood is not unknown to Broadway. He helped Mary Roberts Rinehart dramatize "Seven Days," and wrote "Nobody's Widow," in which Blanche Bates was seen several years ago under Belasco direction. He was the librettist of "Somewhere Else"—but every closet has its skeleton.

In "Fair and Warmer" Mr. Hopwood takes four young people of assorted temperaments, endows them with time and money enough to take themselves seriously and then proceeds to entangle them in a series of situations from which they must be extricated.

The company includes some popular players. Among the number are Madge Kennedy, Janet Beecher, John Cumberland, Ralph Morgan, Hamilton Revelle, Olive May, Guy Bragdon, and Robert Fisher.

Friday night, in the Irving Place Theatre, Rudolf Christians's German stock company will inaugurate a brief season of Viennese operetta. Their first offering will be Leo Ascher's "Hoheit tanzt Walzer," which has been produced with success in Vienna. Arnold Korff and Emmy Nicklass will be seen in the principal rôles, and others in the cast will be Margarete Christians, Angelo Lippich, Ernst Robert, and Willy Frey.

A FRENCH BENEFIT.

The date for the gala performance to be given under the auspices of the Théatre Francais at the Metropolitan Opera House has been set for Monday night, Nov. 8. A number of distinguished French artists have recently arrived to take part and the players of the French company will contribute their services.

Paul Capellani has chosen the occasion for the first presentation of his sketch, "Rouget de Lisle." Lilian Greuze, an actress famed in Paris for her beauty, will make her first American appearance at the benefit. The Opéra Comique will be represented by Mlle. Guirandon and Mlle. Berizat. The latter will sing a song written by Decreux especially for this occasion.

Orchestral Society Concerts.

The first of a series of concerts by the New York Orchestral Society will be given tonight in the Standard Theatre. Fifty musicians will play, with Max Jacobs as conductor. Alice Variet, a coloratura soprano, will be the soloist.

SECOND THOUGHTS ON FIRST NIGHTS

"The New York Idea"—The Plaint of the Untried Composer.

ATTENTION is hereby called to the fact that tomorrow evening's performance begins the last week of "The New York Idea"—the last week, that is, for the present, because Mr. Mitchell's delightful satire should be played again from time to time if Grace George perseveres in her ambitious and attractive program for gradually developing a repertory at the Playhouse. Just now, however, it must give way on the 8th to a revival of "The Liars," by Henry Arthur Jones.

It was in the course of an exceedingly graceful and charming after-dinner speech, made while the Friars were dining and teasing William A. Brady a week ago, that Augustus Thomas spoke of "The New York Idea" as the best American comedy ever produced in New York. Though some eyebrows thereupon mounted perceptibly, there is something to be said in support of such a statement, and if Mr. Mitchell's play has had scant attention from the lecturers and anthologists, it is partly because it is so conspicuously atypical. You scarcely think of it as an American comedy at all.

Some confusion in the written and spoken criticism following the present revival can be traced to the unfamiliar assortment of elements in the play itself.

"I find it very hard to classify 'The New York Idea' under any of the established rubrics," wrote William Archer plaintively in The London Tribune more than eight years ago. "It is rather too extravagant to rank as a comedy; it is much too serious in its purport, too searching in its character delineation, and too thoughtful in its wit to be treated as a mere farce."

To object to the sentiment and pathos lying ever near the surface of Miss George's work as Cynthia Karslake is to ignore a hundred and one indications in the text itself. It is a mistake, attributable possibly to the memory of the hard brilliance which characterized the Fiske production of the play. To make such objection is to be misled by that glittering overlay of wit into thinking of "The New York Idea" as a purely artificial comedy of manners. Although Mary Nash makes rather over-obvious the calculated gush of Mrs. Phillimore, there is some justification in the manuscript for the scheme of her performance, but to say—as some have said—that she alone has caught the right spirit of the play, is not only arrant nonsense, but reminds one a little of the story about the child who watched with filial enthusiasm the passing of a parade in which his father marched.

"And," he exclaimed with great satisfaction, "Pop's the only one in step!"

A Nine-Year-Old Play.

IT is more than nine years since "The New York Idea" was written, and though fashions change rapidly in plays, not an archaic passage was found in the text. The changes are trifling, as where Mr. Phillimore now says, "The modern American marriage is like a wire fence—the woman's the wire—the posts are the husbands. One—two—three! And if you cast your eye over the future, you can count them, post after post, up hill, down dale, all the way to Reno," when he used to say—"all the way to Dakota." But for the rest "The New York Idea" might have been written yesterday. It can trace some of its longevity, it is true, to that quality which accounts partly for the permanence of the Wilde comedies. One reason they are not dead is because they were never really alive. Flowers fade, fruit withers and turns to dust—but time deals gently with diamonds.

"The New York Idea" was never a source of great profit to Mr. Mitchell. It enjoyed, however, a marked succes d'estime, and it has always been quite the thing, even among those who have never seen or read it, to ask indignantly why the American stage has not produced more plays from the same pen. As a matter of fact, Mr. Mitchell has written a good many plays, among them "In the Season," "Becky Sharp," "The New Marriage," and "The Kreutzer Sonata," the last played by Mme. Kalich. If he has done little in recent years, it may be because he has not had to.

"The New York Idea" was first produced in 1906 at the Lyric, and here is the original cast:

Philip Phillimore	Charles Harbury
Mrs. Phillimore	Ida Vernon
Matthew Phillimore	Dudley Clinton
Grace Phillimore	Emily Stevens
Miss Hennessy	Blanche Weaver
William Sudley	William B. Mack
Vida Phillimore	Marion Lea
Brooks	George Harcourt
Benson	Belle Bohn
Cates-Darby	George Arliss
John Karslake	John Mason
Cynthia Karslake	Mrs. Fiske
Nogam	Dudley Digges
Tim Fiddler	Robert V. Ferguson
Thomas	Richard Clarke

Marion Lea made a great impression in the rôle now played by Miss Nash. Miss Lea is Mrs. Mitchell, and it is she to whom the published play is dedicated. Glance over this original cast and think how grievous was the loss to the theatre when the Manhattan Company disbanded and how long has stood empty the place the Playhouse company now hopes to fill.

The Unheard Composer Speaks.

HEREWITH is printed and served the complaint against the producers made by a young composer who has for sale the score and libretto of a musical play. His complaint is not that the managers will not buy his piece, but that they will not look at it, and, though his sufferings doubtless represent an extreme case, there is enough in common between his experiences and those of the men who have trod the same weary road before him, to make his letter of general interest. In part and in wrath he says:

> While we were aware that great difficulty would be encountered when the time came to present the matter to a producer, I must confess that our worst dreams and most horrible nightmares have been dwarfed into insignificance when compared with the reality. Experience bids me say that it is a physical impossibility for a newcomer to have the satisfaction of knowing that his efforts are of no consequence. One cannot get a hearing; mind, this is not the wail of one whose work has been rejected, for such is not the case. You write for an interview. Sometimes you receive a reply stating that their books are filled; more often the courtesy of a reply is not granted you. I fully appreciate that there are hundreds of young men in my position, and that they all cannot be attended to, but it does seem strikingly strange that, during the past seven years, there has been but one musical comedy produced written by two people who were never heard of before. When I say this I am not considering foreigners.
> Why is it that managers are unalterably opposed to having audiences listen to any effort written other than by old-established composers and authors? Every one in the profession except the awe-inspiring managers themselves know that this practice—or shall I say dogma?—is proving fatal. * * * Al those familiar with musical comedy life know that, with the exception of Victor Herbert, there is no composer in this country—and I might be bold enough to say in the world—who can be depended upon to write so many successes in a season or two. In this respect I would like to get a bit more personal, but diplomacy bids me halt. However, I will say that in my opinion there is no other man before the New York public who possesses such a prodigious amount of melody that he can supply the wants of the musical stage to the exclusion of all novices. Surely we can all develop, but under the present highly discouraging and disgusting state of affairs a person's ambition is stifled. As for the books of our modern musical comedies * * * they are positively vapid in a vast majority of instances. In the face of this, which we all know, which we all see every week of the year, the fallacy of the system as carried out by the producing corporations is not alone patent, but paralyzes our powers of comprehension, and in this respect I think I am not alone, for certainly there are others who cannot and never will understand, even in the slightest degree, their methods. Just why two men should supply the stage with more than three-quarters of the librettos that are placed before the public will forever remain a mystery to many, particularly so when these two particular gentlemen have, seasons ago, seen their best days. * * * During the last few months I have witnessed three musical pleys produced by managers who did not have the time to take my work into consideration. The entertainment provided, in each instance, was so poor that the productions failed. I am not saying that my comedy would have enjoyed a better fate, for that is problematical, but it certainly deserved as much consideration. * * * It is to be much lamented that an extremely silly policy prevents a great many meritorious musical plays, written by untried young folk, ever seeing the light of day.

No Conspiracy.

THE point to be made in answer is that even this case, dark as it is, does not prove the existence of an inside ring of librettists nor of any illegal conspiracy in restraint of youth and some new thing. The managers in America are more inaccessible than is good for the theatre, but the untried librettist suffers from a quite natural condition of affairs, one that has long prevailed and is likely to prevail for some time to come.

It is a truism that the untried dramatist finds it harder to get a hearing than the untried novelist, because it costs more to try him out. Where a publisher may make an experiment at the cost of a few hundred dollars the manager must spend a few thousands, save in such simple and thrifty institutions as the Abbey Theatre of Dublin. Furthermore, if it is hard for the most discerning producer to recognize a profitable play in manuscript, it is doubly hard for him to recognize the profitable operetta. And it costs him twice as much to find out.

No other theatrical field offers quite such a gamble. The outlay is heaviest, the chances for adversity greatest. There is none in which such fortunes have been sunk. Such sums as the one exceeding $90,000, which current gossip said was lost in a single musical production last Spring, must give the most reckless producer pause.

Then, too, your manager seldom, if ever, buys a complete score and libretto even from a tried and trusted workman. He has them made to order. He does not look over his morning mail and cry out, happily, "Here, at last, is a musical gem. I will produce it." Rather, he waits until the impulse to produce a musical comedy, at first sternly denied, becomes irresistible. Then he may send to Europe for a score that has the credentials of a long run in some Continental capital. Or he may look over the stage folk already under contract to him, engage a designer of scenes and costumes, and sally forth to catch a composer and librettist. If he is feeling cautious he will catch several of each. The group is set to work together, and out of indescribable confusion a production emerges. It is painful to describe, but Messrs. Wolf and Pollock can tell you all about it. This is not a very promising method, but it is only fair to remember that the finest and most popular comic operas ever contrived for the English-speaking stage were written by composer and librettist with the company in mind when they started to write.

And if the producers are committed by habit and circumstance to producing only custom-made musical plays it is still of considerable interest to determine who shall be intrusted with the work. And those who crave some variation from the pattern which has been unrolled before us season after season must salute respectfully a newcomer among the producers, Manager E. A. Weil, who has ordered his lyrics from the clever Wallace Irwin and his book from the gifted Everett Shinn. Concerning "A Bare Idea," only the opening night can tell any story worth listening to. But Mr. Weil has seen a great light.

And remember, too, gentle composer, that a manager's door may be locked in your face not because he hates novelty, loves Harry B. Smith, and has a deep-seated aversion to youth, but because he has contracts already for all the work in light musical entertainment he can possibly cast and house within the next eighteen months. It sometimes happens that way, and they do say it is that way now with Manager Dillingham. If so, it is highly probable that if a new Gilbert, accompanied by another Sullivan and another Eleanor Painter, were to call upon him he would be obliged, though it broke his heart, to throw them downstairs.

MINUTE VISITS IN THE WINGS

CYRIL Maude visited an American court the other day and the visit recalled one he once made to London's Old Bailey.

"I mounted the bench with my friend," related Mr. Maude, "and gazed very intently about me. It was my first experience in such a court, and I was greatly impressed, but I thought there was a particularly hard-looking crowd in court that morning. I said to the Judge, 'That's a rather rough lot you have to deal with this morning, isn't it?' I am afraid I spoke rather louder than I should, but at any rate he didn't appear to notice my remark. I repeated it. He turned and gave me an agonized look, motioning me under the bench to be quiet. I couldn't imagine what the matter was until we left the bench. Then he said to me, 'For heaven's sake, don't you know those were only the lawyers you were looking at?'"

CRAIG CAMPBELL, the tenor who was seen with Emma Trentini in "The Firefly," and who is now appearing in vaudeville, is probably the only tenor who can, at will, return to the choir of the Little Church Around the Corner. Before adopting the stage as his profession, he was a member of that organization, and Dr. Houghton, the rector of the church, has often written Mr. Campbell saying that whenever he desired to he could return to his place. When Mr. Campbell made his initial vaudeville tour, Dr. Houghton brought the entire choir of the Little Church Around the Corner to applaud their former comrade's efforts.

WELLINGTON CROSS and Lois Josephine, who contribute their share to the success of "Ned Wayburn's Town Topics" at the Century, should be an inspiration to young chorus boys and girls who wonder sometimes if there really is room at the top in the profession. Both Mr. Cross and his dainty wife were choristers not so many years ago, and today they draw large salaries and much applause.

Cross's real name is Duke of Wellington Cross. His father, an employe of the Rock Island Railroad and running out of St. Joe, Mo., where the Duke was born, was an ardent admirer of the British soldier and so handicapped his son. Some of Cross's friends call him Duke; some Wellington, and some Iron.

When he was a chorus boy in 1908 with "The Top o' the World" company, he met a little chorus girl from Boston named Lois Josephine. They played out to the Coast with this show, but when they reached Winona, Minn., on the return journey, they were stranded. Having no money, they got married, and have lived happily ever after. In fact the marriage and the stranding turned out to be the best thing that ever happened to either of them; for, rather than starve without an effort to get bread, they put on an act in Chicago, to which city they had been dispatched by the municipality of Winona. The act proved a success, and the two returned East playing from six to twelve shows a day for $50 a week. This was the real stepping stone to vaudeville fame, for they were booked over the Orpheum Circuit, and met Blanche Ring in Kansas City, and in 1911 were engaged for her company in "The Wall Street Girl." They next appeared at the Winter Garden in 1913, and were on the big-time vaudeville in 1914-1915. They went to the Empire Theatre, London, and remained there until the war, when they returned to America and were immediately engaged for "Town Topics."

LILLIAN RUSSELL, who will return to the stage at the Palace tomorrow, insists that she much prefers vaudeville to comic opera, and will never return to the light musical field unless George Bernard Shaw writes a libretto for her. Her husband, Alexander P. Moore, the Pittsburgh newspaper publisher, has made Shaw an offer to write a libretto which Franz Lehar will set to music if the deal goes through. Miss Russell and her husband are eagerly awaiting news from Shaw. If he declines to follow in the footsteps of W. S. Gilbert, the dazzling Chesterton will be asked to do a libretto. Miss Russell, in speaking of her offer to Shaw, says:

"Bless you, there have been no comic operas written since the Gilbert and Sullivan days. The thing they call comic opera nowadays—what is it? It is a little bit of everything, and not much of anything. It is utterly trivial and foolish. There are no librettos—or at least very few—that an intelligent person can listen to without suffering severe pain. What I need is a libretto written by George Bernard Shaw. If he writes me one I'll go back to comic opera, for Lehar has promised to do the score for the Shaw book. Now there's a real promise. I love Shaw's plays, and, do you know, I wanted to play Lady Cicely in "Captain Brassbound's Conversion," in 'Captain Brassbound's Conversion,' took it away from me.

"My voice is in better condition today than it ever has been before. It is really much easier to act than to sing. Singing means hard work, because you have to observe a rigid regime to keep yourself in form. It spoils all your good time because just when the fun is beginning you have to go home. You are always dodging something that is going to interfere with your voice."

ONE note of realism that has thus far escaped attention in Roi Cooper Megrue's war drama at the Hudson, "Under Fire," is the fact that the soldiers who appear in the trench scene of the third act all wear wrist watches. Mr. Megrue was much interested in the report brought back from the war front by Irvin S. Cobb that he found all the soldiers wearing wrist watches, and he insisted that his soldiers be likewise outfitted. The fact has been known all along to the press agent, but until now he has managed to keep it a dark secret.

Pictures at the Bandbox.

Painting and sculpture will be shown at the Bandbox Theatre during the Winter. A small room off the foyer has been decorated by P. T. Frankl and in it is hung an exhibit of paintings by C. Bertram Hartman, a young American artist who recently returned from Europe. When the next bill of playlets is presented another group of pictures will be shown. The work of sculptors will also be exhibited.

TOPPING THE VAUDEVILLE BILLS.

PALACE—Lillian Russell, returning to the stage with a repertoire of songs that includes some of the old ones with which her name is associated and some written for this occasion; a condensed version of "Faust" sung by a company that includes Estelle Wentworth and Salvatore Giordana; "Peaches," George V. Hobart's sketch, acted by William Courtleigh and company.

COLONIAL—Nora Bayes in songs and gowns; Ralph Dunbar's newest offering, the Maryland Singers in Southern songs; Frankie Heath and George Perry in a specialty of song and patter; Isabelle Lowe and company in Edgar Allan Woolf's sketch, "Hope."

ALHAMBRA—Dorothy Jardon singing songs and displaying a wardrobe of stunning gowns; Homer B. Mason and Marguerite Keeler in Porter Emerson Browne's playlet, "Married"; Gertrude Vanderbilt and George Moore, reunited, in a program of songs and dances.

Famous Picture's Last Days.

The last four weeks of "The Birth of a Nation" at the Liberty have been announced. At the end of the engagement the film will have been shown 725 consecutive times in New York. The producers of the picture point with pride to the fact that the longest run ever registered in New York by a play was that of "A Trip to Chinatown." This was acted 670 consecutive times.

The run of 725 is achieved only by counting the performances both at the Liberty and at Brighton Beach.

MR. LAUDER'S NEW SONGS.

They All Feature the Well-Known Lassie.

When Harry Lauder begins his eighth annual tour in New York Nov. 15, he will have in his repertory more new songs than he has ever presented in one program, and while it is quite likely that his audiences will demand some of the old favorites with which the name of Lauder is indissolubly linked, he will give them a wealth of new material.

Several of the new songs, such as "Bonnie Maggie Tamson," "She Comes Frae Bonnie Scotland," "I'll Stick to Rosie," "Come Back, Nanny, I Never Loved Another Girl Like You," and "Jean, My Jean," sing the fame of Scotland and its bonnie lassie. In another song, "The Same as His Faither Was Before Him," Mr. Lauder portrays the pride of paternity with characterist c humor. In still another new song, in which Mr. Lauder portrays the character of Doughie, the baker, he promises to create quite as great a sensation as he did in "The Saftest o' the Family." "It's Nicer When We Make it Up Again" is the song he sings in this characterization, and here he discards the kilt and appears as a happy but dusty baker.

A LITTLE JOURNEY TO THE HOME OF ELSIE JANIS

THIS is a little journey to the home of Elsie Janis—not the home of her birth in Columbus, Ohio, which is kept furnished and ready for its talented mistress, but the historic Philipse Manor, near Tarrytown on the Hudson, which the actress recently bought and has restored till it is at once one of the most attractive and interesting houses in this part of the world.

The Philipse Manor house has a history. It is said to be the oldest house in the State. George Washington used to visit there—but then George was a famous visitor, and the old houses he didn't sleep in are more rare than those he did. There is a bronze panel on the wall beside the exquisite entrance that tells about the house—put there by "the daughters or aunts or grandmothers of the Revolution," Miss Janis says. As a matter of fact, the Colonial Dames did the plaçarding, and this is what it says:

Castle Philipse
This House Was Built About 1683
by Fredrich Philipse
First Lord of the Manor of Philipsburgh
The Manor Was Granted in 1693 by
Gov. Fletcher
Placed by the Colonial Dames of the State of New York
MCMVI

It is a stunning old structure, a fine specimen of Colonial architecture, with its graceful lines. It is a large house, and, set in spacious wide grounds, it presents an imposing picture from the street. It has been restored several times, of course, and there are baths and telephones and electric lights that would surprise Lord Philipse and the rest of them should they return in the spirit, but in the main the house is much as it was. The room where George Washington used to sleep has been fitted up with old four-posters and other pieces of Colonial furniture, and down in the library Mrs. Janis has placed a baby grand, the case of which she had made to carry out the Colonial style. It is all very comfortable and livable, and the manor house is destined to witness many more jolly parties, for Mrs. Janis and her daughter are a hospitable pair.

Mrs. Janis, America's most famous and most capable stage mother, is having quite as much fun fixing up the place as is Miss Elsie. To her has fallen the task of getting things done, and in handling the workmen she has shown the same executive ability that has characterized her management of her clever daughter.

Back of the house runs a tiny stream that winds somewhere safe to the Sound. On this stream Lord Philipse built a mill in which flour was ground, to be carried down to his own ships on the Sound and to Holland. The old mill is gone, (here there should be trembly music,) but the foundations on which it stood remain and part of the retaining wall that runs beside the house. The rest of the wall has been restored, and at the foot of it a tennis court is being built, a sort of a hanging court that rims the stream, necessitating a high wire net around it or the use of balls that will float. Across the creek are several acres of wooded land that rises abruptly, forming a natural barrier on that side of the premises. At the foot of this wooded cliff a little tea garden will be built, and when the members of future house parties are on the court or roaming about the tea garden in their gay sport clothes Janis Creek will look like a bit of the dear old Thames.

Seated around the dinner table the other night the talk drifted to Miss Janis's visit to London last Summer.

"In the theatre it was much the same as when I played my first engagement at the Palace," she said. "The audiences were large and enthusiastic. They were a different kind of audience, it is true—not so many London people and more soldiers back from the trenches on leave or troopers in training. They were wonderfully kind and appreciative."

(The writer saw a London audience worshipping at Miss Janis's dancing feet, so when she modestly says they were "kind and appreciative," it means they cheered and cried "Bravo!" or whatever English audiences cry.)

"There was much talk of Zeppelins and we kept looking for bombs to come through the roof, but when we were there the Zeps hadn't got beyond the outskirts. I spent a great deal of my time when not playing singing to the wounded. I didn't go to Lady What-What's—the officers had a fine enough time of it. I left them to their teas and devoted myself entirely to the private soldiers. In the wards there would be the men who were only slightly wounded in the centre, sitting up in chairs, then a row or two of fellows more seriously hurt, but still in fair shape, and around the edge the poor chaps who were flat on their backs.

"I used to get them to sing with me. At first they would mumble the words, and then I would jolly them and tell them what poor singers they were and how I had heard how good they were. After a few more tries they would be shouting the song and having a bully time. They were particularly fond of 'I Want to Go Back to Michigan,' and when they came to 'nevertheless' in the chorus they yelled it.

"Poor souls—they are such plucky chaps. I remember talking to one poor boy who had lost both feet from frost bite. I was commiserating with him when he said cheerfully: "I think I'm pretty lucky, Miss. I might have lost my eyes instead.' So many of them have lost their eyes, big, fine-looking men with apparently not a thing the matter with them, and yet stone blind, with the optic nerve shattered so they will never see again."

When this war came Miss Janis was in London with plans and contracts for a tour that would take her to Paris, Berlin, and Vienna. In Paris she was to have acted in French in a musical comedy at the Gymnase; in the other cities Franz Lehar had been commissioned to write an operetta for her use.

"Whenever I feel blue over what I missed," she said, "I take out my contracts and look at them. I had a letter from my Paris manager the other day and he said that even this war must some day come to an end and then I was to come there. I certainly shall if I am not an old bearded lady by the time the war is over. If I am I shall not go, for they will have enough people on crutches without me.

"Ben Tebeau, a famous Viennese manager, arranged for my Vienna engagement. I will never forget his sketch of the plot for which Lehar was to write the music. 'You be the poor little girl in rags,' he said, (all this in the perfect Janis imitative style,) 'sitting by the roadside, when along comes a rich old man who takes you home with him. The second act it is a fine palace, the home of the rich man, whose son has fallen in love with you and you are his mistress.'

"He got that far, and then mother took a hand.

"'I am surprised, Mr. Tebeau,' mother interrupted, 'that you should think for a moment I would allow or that my daughter would consent to play such a rôle.'

"'Das all right, das all right,' he answered, 'he can marry the girl if you wish.'

"In the Apollo, where I was to have appeared, they eat during the performance as they do in many German theatres. I didn't think much of that. I had visions of myself imitating Bernhardt and a waiter coming down the aisle and spilling a tray of sausages. So I suggested that the eating be dispensed with.

"As you wish, Miss Janis, as you wish. We won't have them eat, but I think they enjoy your performance much better if they eat.".

At the actors' garden party, an annual charity event in London, Miss Janis took part and collected many pounds for the fund.

"One of the things I did in the Palace revue was stunts with the lariat. Where did I learn them? From watching Fred Stone do them. At the garden party in a tent I spun the lariat and made several pounds by betting the men, most of them soldiers, that they couldn't do the trick. They tried in that delightfully unconscious British way of doing a thing without feeling foolish. 'Now, isn't that extraordinary!' they would say when the rope would refuse to spin. 'the beastly thing looks easy enough, but, 'pon my soul, I can't seem to make it.' And then they would hand over their shilling. Toward the last there was one little fellow who sat watching. He didn't offer to try it, and when I asked him to try he came forward timidly, took the lariat, and spun it beautifully. 'It's hardly fair, Miss,' he said, 'for I've been doing it for many years.' It developed that he had spent a long time on a Wyoming ranch."

Miss Janis looks upon the movies as great sport.

"I shouldn't want to do them regularly or for any length of time," she said, "but to come into a lot of money suddenly and have a bully time doing it they are great. I never had a better time than I did in California making movies."

Every night after her performance in "Miss Information" Miss Janis and her mother drive out to the Manor House. It is about an hour's ride as the Metallurgique flies, with Frank, the trusted chauffeur of many years' service, at the wheel. Miss Elsie spends the day tramping in the woods, and usually there are three or four friends from town to loaf with. An early dinner, and the big car back to town, with Mother Janis on the lookout for hostile motor cops and ready with diplomatic words to placate them should they interfere.

A new Sousa march entitled "The Pathfinder of Panama" will be played by the composer's band tonight at the Hippodrome, Orville Harrold, Belle Storey, and Sidonie Spero will sing, and the entire Hippodrome chorus will appear.

LUNCHEON WITH THE YELLOW FACES

By CYRIL MAUDE

Being part of a letter wherein the distinguished English actor recounts some of his experiences while working on the side for the Premo Feature Film Corporation during his recent engagement in New York. "The Yellow Face" of the Sherlock Holmes story referred to a ghastly mask, but the Yellow Faces that doubtless haunt Mr. Maude's dreams these nights are those of the movie folk as they assemble, incongruous in various makeups and styles of war paint, when the luncheon hour comes at the studio."

"IT is quite time we had some food," said the director, the all-powerful, the ruler of my movie destinies the last three weeks.

We had been working hard and with appropriate gravity in a graveyard (no subtle joke intended, please) all the morning. As we bowled down Broadway I had succeeded in avoiding the public gaze most successfully by sitting with one hand covering the side of my face, and with the other holding down low the brim of my hat. Occasionally, though, I would see some poor lady give a jump as she caught sight of a weird old yellow face peering sideways out of the window, but we sped along so swiftly that I imagine she merely thought her liver was a bit wrong. As we crossed the ferry, I couldn't help wondering what sort of a strange old thing people would imagine they had got on board if I attempted to get out of the car, so I cowered inside it. At last we got to our destination, a cemetery near some ammunition and explosive factories, and filled with the graves of dead Germans.

Am I hypersensitive this morning or is it, after all, any wonder that I, an Englishman, half Irish, should feel something uncanny in the place I had to work, that moment and its strange juxtaposition to the explosive factories? Occasionally we would hear the deep booming of guns, and I was informed that it was the noise of the trials of the explosives destined, many of them, to aid in defending my beloved country, my wife and my children. And here was I doing my best in a strange sort of way to make enough money to pay the fearful taxes which loom before us in the mist of anxious war clouds. Here was I, doing my morning's work in a cemetery literally crowded with dead Germans, Germans who had probably died full of patriotic enthusiasm for their Fatherland, and not Germans filled with the amazing doubt, like so many nowadays, as to the wisdom or the righteousness of the war lords who have their former country under their thumb.

Oh, the irony of it all! I, the picture puppet, have to walk down the avenue of Brichsteins, Hechsteins, and then, hand in hand with my little granddaughter of this movie morning, kneel down and weep and pray over the tomb of a Schnickenhutzenhausen! Over and over again we come sorrowfully down that melancholy path and kneel down. The mother of the child has moist eyes. I wonder why. The baby girl tells me in an interlude while we are waiting for the producer to think out some even more touching way in which I can show my movie feelings in mute appeal to heaven, that "we have got two graves in our family somewhere here, where Gran'pa and Gran'ma is buried, and our baby, too." And as I approach the mother after my work is over, for the first time I feel touched and sorrowful for her. She tells me quite simply that her husband was a German, but the hyphen seems to have quite slipped away since Lusitania day.

"We is against 'em now, but he thinks that the war could be easily stopped by the States refusing to supply ammunition to the Allies."

Big booms in the distance punctuate her remarks, and I set her wondering by telling her that I have this morning been informed by some one who knows that only a tenth part of the ammunition used at the front came from this country!

But even graveyard work does not stop hunger, and away we all speed to the lunchroom of a group of the great picture-producing studios of the world. We feel we are approaching something strange as a cowboy or two gallop past. Is it my fancy that the cowboy suddenly gets just a trifle more débonnair and perhaps a little more wild and woolly as he sees he is being observed by the occupants of a smart car? And is it my fancy again that he seems to lose his Western look when he sees merely yellow faces looking out at him?

We drive up to the door of the lunchroom, and as I enter I must confess to a feeling of shyness at my strange appearance. But I find myself surrounded by such a remarkable crowd of weird-looking people that I soon feel completely at home. Every possible kind of character is having lunch there, and the yellow paint makes us all look none too desirable as acquaintances, I can tell you. Every imaginable kind of costume is there, too, and one soon learns to feel no possible kind of surprise in turning from a table where is seated an old Irishman of the most broken-down type eating his lunch very calmly with Marie Antoinette, and again contemplating the frail Camille discussing the latest success in the picture line with the magnificent-looking Mexican and a parlor maid and a Dutch peasant. Of course you have seen all that kind of thing at the fancy-dress balls, you will say, but, believe me, it all assumes a different proportion in the sunlight among the Yellow Faces.

And we take ourselves very, very seriously, we Yellow Faces! And, please, why shouldn't we? I am only an amateur at the game, and feel always I am regarded as some amateur would be on adventuring into stage life. It isn't how long have you been on the stage, or how many theatres have you owned, or how many hundred plays have you yourself produced that is the question now. It is how many pictures have you appeared in? Do you register well? I keep wondering how they like the look of their faces on the screen, most of them, or whether they loathe them as much as I do mine when I see it flickering past me and keep wishing that God had made my chin a little less long or my nose a little bit longer.

Everybody seems to know everybody more or less and everybody looks kindly at me and seems to welcome me with his eyes. The most of them seem to have quite wonderful eyes, too, both men and women. Useful features in the movies, perhaps the most useful of all! Here comes a man in a strange garb whom I seem to remember. Yes, he is one of your biggest actors now devoting his time entirely to this work, and with visions likely to be shortly realized, of retiring with a good fortune to that lovely little place on the coast.

"Not had an accident yet," says he, piously tapping the chair I sat on. "But how I love the risks I take. It is one long thrill, this life of mine now! I must confess, though, I am rather dreading the having to jump off a fire-escape on to a motor car rushing by at a great speed this afternoon."

"Quelle vie, mon dieu, quelle vie!"

I am greeted by a charming young actor from the Comédie Française, who is over here after doing fine work in the French trenches and is now engaged in a more peaceful task until his leave of absence comes to an end. He tells me how very nervous he always feels as he acts before the camera, knowing that it is to be recorded now for all time, this acting of his, and that he cannot determine to play it better "tomorrow night at the Comédie!"

Here is a French producer from top to toe, evidently an artist of the finest calibre. One longs to work with him. It must be like sitting to some great painter!

Everywhere there is enthusiasm among the Yellow Faces, enthusiasm and great interest in their approaching fates. What may they not have to do after lunch and in this their last one? Jealousy there is, too, among the Yellow Faces, not so much of each other (though I did catch sight of an old gentleman with such an interesting face looking sourly at me as much as to say in a very kindly sort of way, "What the —— is this old bloke doing here!") but jealousy of one firm for another and loyal jealousy of Yellow Faces working for one firm about the other firm possibly having a greater success than their firm!

Many and many an interesting story is told too about the melodramatic adventures the lunchers have endured unflinchingly, and ever and anon there come through the windows the shrieks of a crowd in a neighboring Spanish market place where what they are apt to call a big scene is being enacted!

"We've had a wonderful time this morning," says a horrible looking ruffian who passes our table, "we wanted two old women to appear in a fright in a crowd and we got two fearful looking old harridans out of the street close by, and act—didn't they act? Sarah Bernhardt wouldn't have been in it! They was simply terrified" !!!

He introduces us to another man, (they are, I believe, both dear good fellows at home and go to church very regularly, but now, even armed cap-à-pie, I would not go home with either in the dark,) and this new-found disreputable looking Y. F. bursts at once into long descriptions of perfectly blood-curdling scenarios he has conceived and placed advantageously for himself, but to the possible detriment or possible destruction of many a movie actor and actress and the certain terror of many a child for all time. Hear one about the crocodiles that begin to nibble at the opposite ends of a hero at the same time when he is bound with cords to the villain he has succeeded at last in causing to go off into a dead faint by forcing his thumbs into the other's eyes after learning that he (the villain) had seduced in the early eighties his (the hero's) sainted mother—fade away—and then * * * *.

But, no, I can't bear it after lunch. So I will merely end like the French novelist does when things get a bit, well, pas pour les jeunes filles, with an * and a few more * * * * *.

PEG IN THE CELLAR

LAURETTE TAYLOR, who is still playing "Peg o' My Heart" in London to such large audiences that she doesn't dare return to America to carry out the plans made for her, doesn't like the Zeppelins. In a letter to George C. Tyler, her American manager, she thus sets forth her feeling in the matter:

"The night the Zeppelins came I was just finishing the last act. It seemed difficult for a few moments to realise (after a year of darkened streets and threatening talk) that they were really over the housetops. I went down in the cellar and, like a good Catholic, said my prayers.

"The company followed me into the cellar, but I was the only one that said my prayers. 'A lot of heathens,' I calls 'em. For three days afterward I was really fearfully ill. I had fully determined never to act again in London until the war had finished, but, as everybody else went on, 'business as usual,' you know, I didn't feel as though I could afford to have people say I was afraid, so I came back to prove that I am not afraid, but I don't mind telling you I am scared to death.

"I will say the English are the most remarkable race I have ever met with, and, if I were a German, I should hate their insides. Even Hartley, whom I have never considered an especially brave man, went up on the roof of the Green Room Club to look at the Zeppelins, and walked all the way over here to the Globe and, finding me in the cellar, quoted one of the lines from 'Peg': 'Come out and look at it; they're beautiful in this part of the country.' I was furious with him."

44TH STREET—Twilight sleep pictures.

THE widely heralded pictures of "Carmen," for which Geraldine Farrar acted the rôle she has sung at the Metropolitan, will be given their first public showing in New York today at the Strand. The pictures have already been released in neighboring cities, so that the novelty of them has worn off a bit, perhaps, but the numbers who have inquired the past week for reserved seats indicates that there is plenty of interest in the event, and record-breaking audiences will no doubt see the pictures.

The Strand management has shown commendable restraint in this particular instance. After it was arranged that the film should be exhibited there the men who had made the pictures possible by investing their money realized they might exploit them to better advantage by placing them in another theatre and charging bigger prices. So they made an attractive offer to the Strand to be released from their contract. But the management decided to keep faith with their public and retained their rights to the film. The temptation to raise the regular schedule of prices and to sell reserved seats was also brushed aside, and Strand patrons will be able to see Geraldine Farrar without paying any more than they would to watch the mimings of any of the lesser lights of film land.

Miss Farrar is not to have a monopoly on the famous Prosper Merimee story. In the Academy of Music another "Carmen" picture, with Theda Bara as the Spanish girl, will be exhibited.

Sections of "The Battle Cry of Peace," from the Vitagraph Theatre, were selected by J. Stuart Blackton, through the efforts of United States Immigration Commissioner Frederic C. Howe, to instill patriotism and teach the duties of citizenship to the men who cast their first vote this year. The film was shown at the reception in the Lewisohn Stadium of the College of the City of New York yesterday.

This method of teaching the new voters, many of whom are former immigrants, is original with Commissioner Howe.

"It is only by graphic lessons," says Mr. Howe, "that the stern duties of the individual toward his country can be impressed upon the minds of many of the foreign born. To drive this lesson home we must turn to the only universal language—the language of the film."

At Grugliasco, ten miles from Turin, Italy, where Mrs. Leslie Carter acted "Du Barry" before the camera, under the direction of George Kleine, stands an imposing building in which there is a luxuriously fitted suite of five rooms fixed up especially for Irene Fenwick and her mother. Just now it is probably occupied by officers of the Italian Army, or maybe as a hospital for wounded Italian soldiers, or as a retreat for convalescing troopers.

The building is a reconstructed villa owned by Mr. Kleine, near which he built an elaborate motion-picture studio. The outbreak of the war interfered with Mr. Kleine's plans regarding his Grugliasco studio, and Italy's entrance into the war has halted them entirely.

The value a California community places on the installation of a motion-picture plant in its midst is shown by the recent purchase by Thomas H. Ince of a large site in Culver City, near Los Angeles. For a long time the Triangle director has been making his pictures at Inceville, near Santa Monica. He desired to enlarge his facilities and began negotiations with a real estate firm. Before the discussion had proceeded very far the director said:

"Your town may be all right, but who will receive the more benefit from my going there, you or me?"

The end of the meeting was an agreement by the real estate company to deed thirty acres of land to Ince on condition that he erect a complete film-producing plant to cost not less than $100,000. The officers of the company knew that Ince had spent $750,000 at Inceville before he got through and were confident that they would get a big return when the Culver City studio began to expand.

Micha, Geraldine Farrar's pet goat at the Lasky studio, broke loose from her moorings one night recently and was discovered by Wilfred Buckland, the art director, Monday morning on top of his desk just swallowing the last bit of paper containing the completed plans for the "Mr. Grex of Monte Carlo" sets. Frank Reicher, the director, was held up in his work two days through Micha's appetite.

The flesh-and-blood stage has lost its attractiveness for Bessie Barriscale, who appears at the Knickerbocker Theatre this week as a Triangle star in "The Golden Claw." A permanent home in Santa Monica, not far from the Ince studio, makes more of an appeal to her than memories of the many seasons of road tours with prominent companies.

At the age of 5 Miss Barriscale was a member of James A. Herne's company playing in "Shore Acres." Little Eva in "Uncle Tom's Cabin" and Madge in the perennial "In Old Kentucky" were two rôles which fell to her in her early stage experience. The United States and England saw her as Lovey Mary in "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch." Later David Belasco put her in "The Rose of the Rancho." Then she appeared in Richard Walton Tully's "The Bird of Paradise," playing the Laurette Taylor rôle at Maxine Elliott's Theatre.

After that came the films. She was called to do "The Rose of the Rancho" for the screen, and there she has remained.

The natives of the town of Panamint, on the edge of Death Valley, received a rude shock the other day when an Eastern tourist dashed into their midst with the news of a big gold strike in an abandoned mine near there and exhibited several nuggets to prove his assertion. The whole district seized their trusty picks and pans and dashed out in search of the wealth, only to be led to the abandoned mine, where the Lasky players, under Cecil B. De Mille's direction, had been taking some scenes for Victor Moore in "Chimmie Fadden Out West." A few prop nuggets had been left scattered about.

Julius Steger, who has recently appeared with considerable success in the photoplay versions of "The Fifth Commandment" and "The Master of the House," is the latest acquisition to the list of stars of the Metro pictures, in which Miss Ethel Barrymore, William Faversham and others are now appearing. Mr. Steger has signed a contract with Rolfe Photo Plays, Inc., to appear exclusively on the Metro program. His first appearance will be in "The Blindness of Love," a comedy-drama by Ruth Comfort Mitchell.

NED WAYBURN'S TOWN TOPICS
Dear Mr. Wayburn:—
Seeing this wonderful production of "Town Topics" of yours made me regret for the first time that I am no longer writing theatrical reviews. I should have loved to try and do that First Act ballet of yours justice. My hat is off not only to you for this supremely lovely pageant, but to Adelaide and Hughes for the exquisite way in which they bring your wonderful color scene to life. More power to you!

MR. HOPPER IS CHEERFUL

BY CARLYLE ELLIS.

DE WOLF HOPPER, in the make-up of Don Quixote plus a tweed hat and the inevitable briar, had just come in to the Fine Arts Studio from a "location" among the hills back of Los Angeles where scenes for a Triangle photo dramatization of the great Spanish classic were being filmed.

This is Mr. Hopper's first experience in photoplay and he is intensely interested in its growing possibilities. He was comparing notes with a group of Broadway acquaintances of whom he says, "they seem all to be here in Los Angeles."

"I like it," he said, "I like it better every day. But I would like it better still," and he shook his head sadly, "if it were not for the frightfully early hours. Think of it, I am made up at half past nine; I am keyed up all day, and—I am shot at five.

"But what one misses most is the applause, the response of an audience. You give your best to a scene, the camera stops buzzing and—there is silence. It is frightful. I keep imagining I have failed. So I'm getting into the way of waiting hungrily for a word of encouragement from the directors, and they say it is going admirably."

"How do you like the prospect of spending a whole Winter away from New York?" asked some one.

"My boy, it's wonderful. Think of it. I have a real home, the first in thirty years, with a garden, and literally my own vines and fig trees—and other fruits. And my Jap boy is the most marvelous cook ever given to a man.

"And you should see my baby." The famous comedian swells with pride at every thought of his new son. "He is the most remarkable baby I have ever known—of course every father says that, but I am serious. I give you my word—he is eight months old and I have never heard him cry. Never a sick minute, never a symptom of teething. The doctor will promise that on Tuesday the sixteenth at 7:23, we may expect a tooth, and if we look at 7:23 there it is.

"But, unfortunately," Hopper's voice sank to mournful rumble, "I am greatly afraid he is going to look like me. In fact," the big voice dropped half an octave lower, "he does already, extraordinarily so."

After the laugh some one brought the veteran actor back to the subject of Don Quixote, and he instantly became animated again.

"Quixote is a great opportunity," he said. "He is an immortal creation, a figure that in essence fits all time. Every one knows him and—do you realize it?—not one in ten thousand has read the book, though it is a world classic.

"I think it a fine thing to make the strange figure of the crack-brained old knight live again in the beautiful pictorialization that this is going to be. It is going to help us understand why, though he tilted against a mode of thought long since dead, he is a living, vital figure today. We laugh at the impractical idealism, that has a hundred counterparts in our own world, but we are touched by the pathos of the old man's folly, and that, I think, is why the story has lived, and that is why I believe in it as a photoplay."

"Your car is here, Mr. Hopper," said an attendant.

The comedian disappeared, but came hurrying back.

"Come," he called. "Come all of you. The most wonderful baby of all time is here, and you shall see him. You won't have to take my word for anything."

Pretty Mrs. Hopper had brought Master Hopper to meet his father, who seized him, and, expatiating upon the wonder of his achievements to the assembled players, bore the bright-eyed and sturdy infant triumphantly through the crowd to Director Griffith's office to prove that he had not in the least exaggerated.

"They call me a cheerful man," he said a little later, as the baby was restored to its mother. "But how in the light of heaven could I be anything else!"

BROOKLYN AMUSEMENTS.

MONTAUK.—Willard Mack's international success, "Kick In," with Richard Bennett in the rôle created by Jack Barrymore last year at the Longacre, and Clara Joel in the leading woman's part.

MAJESTIC.—Edward Locke's play "The Revolt," with Olga Petrova in the leading rôle.

TELLER'S.—Edward Sheldon's dramatic arrangement of Sudermann's novel of Continental life, "The Song of Songs," with Irene Fenwick, Thomas A. Wise, and Cyril Keightley in their original rôles.

GRAND.—The Grand Opera House stock players in "The Brute."

ORPHEUM—Keith vaudeville featuring the fashion show seen several weeks ago at the Palace; Harry Fox and Yansci Dolly in song, dance and patter; Fred V. Bowers and company in a song revue.

BUSHWICK.—These feature acts of Keith vaudeville: "The Bride Shop," a musical comedy in miniature, with Andrew Tombes and Lola Wentworth as the principals; the Avon Comedy Four in their familiar sketch, "The New Teacher"; Dolly Connolly and Percy Wenrich, singing songs written by the latter.

PROSPECT.—Sam Chip and Mary Marble in the sketch from the Lambs Gambol, entitled "The Clock Shop," as the feature of a program of Keith vaudeville that includes also Mr. and Mrs. Jimmie Barry in their bucolic sketch, "The Rube," and Hermine Shone and company in "The Last of the Quakers."

WHAT BEFELL CHARLOTTE

CHARLOTTE fell on the ice while executing one of her graceful whirls at the Hippodrome the other night with a thud that brought an audible gasp from the audience. She lay there a minute, her muscles relaxed as though she were unconscious, while the audience held its breath. But in a minute she was on her feet and continuing her remarkable performance.

"It is a curious fact," said Charlotte afterward in German, that was translated by the official interpreter kept at the Hippodrome to communicate the wishes of the skaters to the management, "that falls rarely hurt the skater. I suppose the main reason is that when one is skating fast, or even reasonably fast, and falls, the angle at which the ice is struck is such that little damage results. It is not a very pleasant thing to fall unexpectedly when one is executing any important figure, but all the same it hurts little more than one's dignity.

"In all the great competitions of the world for figure skating championships a fall is entirely disregarded by the judges and is not marked against the competitor. Of course, if one should fall too many times it would not be entirely ignored and would be marked against the skater as an indication of ungraceful carriage.

"In one of my tries for an important skating medal in Austria I had the misfortune to have a very bad fall. I went back to the same starting place and began my figure all over again. When I got to the place where I had fallen before, something tripped me and I fell again. The judges investigated the spot in the ice and found an embedded bit of the steel brush with which the ice had been scraped. I lost nothing by those falls—in fact, to put it differently, I had three trials for a figure which my competitors were allowed to essay but once. So I was even grateful for them.

"I am sometimes asked if there is not a special way to fall on the ice. There is not. There is a special way to fall in circus tumbling or where one is doing gymnastic work with a pad or light mattress to alight on or even where uncovered boards are used. But this is quite different from the tumbles one gets in skating. These are so unexpected and the balance is so very delicate that no amount of twisting or turning of the body could alter it very much. I generally try to come down as easily as I can, and if I think about anything at all it is more likely to be the question of turning an ankle than anything else. No! I'll be very honest with you, and add that one of the first things I think of if I feel that I am in danger of falling is the protection of my skating costume. Now isn't that just like a woman?"

Alexandra Carlisle, William A. Sheer, and other principals of the Equitable's "Creeping Tides" cast, have been in Pittsburg, where some interesting mining scenes, including an explosion, were taken in the Braddock mine, a thousand feet below the surface. There was only one casualty and from that no serious results are apprehended.

Wally Van, in producing "Hughie of the Circus" for Vitagraph, turned the studio yard into a circus lot, using the regulation saw-dust ring and tiers of circus seats covered by a twenty-foot top. The camera caught gayly caparisoned horses and the complete equipment of an old-time one-ring circus in gala array as they make their grand entrance, as well as the side-show freaks.

NEWS FROM THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Mme. Olive Fremstad.
Specially engaged for "Tosca" with the Boston Opera Company.

Mme. Schumann-Heink.

Mme. Melba.

Marian Veryl.

One of the Busiest Weeks of the Music Season Up to the Present Time Begins with Today's Concert---Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Its Season and Boston Opera Company Enters on Its Last Week.

THE musical activity for the coming week is fully as pronounced as has been the rule since the season got under way a few weeks ago. Perhaps the principal novelty is the first appearance for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be heard under Dr. Muck on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The New York Symphony Society will give Sunday and Friday afternoon concerts, but the Philharmonic Society is on tour and will not appear in New York this week. Besides the orchestras there will be chamber music and many song and instrumental recitals.

Walter Damrosch has prepared a Tschaikowsky program for the concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra at Aeolian Hall this afternoon. Percy Grainger, the Australian pianist, will make his first appearance of the season as the soloist, playing the concerto in B flat minor. The orchestral numbers are the symphonic poem "Manfred" and the Andante from his Quartet for Strings.

On Friday and next Sunday afternoon Frieda Hempel will be the soloist with this orchestra. She will sing airs from Mozart's "Die Entführung aus dem Serail," and Meyerbeer's "Dinorah," together with a vocal arrangement of Strauss's "Blue Danube" waltz. The orchestral numbers will be the overture to "Oberon" and the prelude to "L'apres-midi d'un faune" by Debussy.

Mme. Melba will be heard for the first time this season at a recital this afternoon at Carnegie Hall, which she will give with the assistance of Beatrice Harrison, 'cellist; Robert Parker, baritone, and Frank St. Legere, pianist. Mme. Melba will sing "Sweet Bird that Shun'st the Noise of Folly," from Handel's "L'Allegro and il Penseroso," arias from "Tosca" and "La Bohème," three songs by Duparc and Bemberg, and Arditi's waltz song "Se Saran Rose." Among Miss Harrison's numbers will be Handel's Sonata in G minor for 'cello, and among Mr. Parker's "Don Juan's Serenade," by Tschaikowsky, and the Prologue to "Pagliacci."

The New York Orchestral Society, Max Jacobs conductor, will give a concert this evening at the Standard Theatre, Broadway and Ninetieth Street. Mme. Alice Verlet will be the assisting artist. The program will comprise such material as the "Oberon" Overture by Weber, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite and the ballet music from "Faust." Mme. Verlet will sing an aria from "Rigoletto," and the jewel song from "Faust."

Marian Veryl, a soprano not known to New York audiences, will give a song recital tomorrow afternoon at Aeolian Hall. Her program consists of a group of old music, four songs in German, two arias from "The Secret of Suzanne" and "The Sicilian Vespers," three songs in French, and some songs in English. She will be assisted at the piano by Alberto Bimboni.

David and Clara Mannes will give the second of their sonata recitals at Aeolian Hall tomorrow evening, featuring Chausson's Concerto in D for violin, piano, and string quartet, which they gave for the first time last season. The Saslavsky String Quartet will be the assisting artists. The other numbers will be the sonatas for violin and piano in D minor by Schumann, and in G, Op. 30, No. 3, by Beethoven.

A concert for the benefit of the Italian war sufferers will be given tomorrow evening in Carnegie Hall. The principal work to be performed will be Verdi's Requiem Mass, with choruses from the Metropolitan Opera House, the Church Choir Club, and the Labor Temple. The soloists for this and other numbers will be Giovanni Martinelli and Luca Botta of the Metropolitan Opera House, Philip Bennyan, Giovanni Martino, Mlle. Adele Dilli, Dr. Daniel A. Sullivan, Mme. Carolyn Cole, Mrs. Julia Kubler, and Lucille Collette, violinist.

Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink will give her first recital Tuesday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. Her program will consist principally of German Lieder, with a few songs by American composers. Those represented on the program comprise Handel, Schubert, Schumann, Liszt, Franz, Brahms, Beethoven, Strauss, Max Reger, Gertrude Ross, James H. Rogers, and Frank La Forge. The concluding number will be Schubert's "Serenade," sung with a male quartet consisting of Daniel Beddoe, Graham Reed, Thomas H. Thomas, and Donald A. Chalmers. Anton Hoff will assist at the piano.

The first of Ossip Gabrilowitsch's series of six historical recitals will be given in Aeolian Hall on Tuesday afternoon. This program will be devoted to clavier composers of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, embracing the English, French, Italian, North-German and Viennese schools. The second recital will be devoted to Beethoven, the third to the Romantic composers, the fourth to Chopin, the fifth to Brahms and Liszt, and the sixth to a long list of modern composers. The program of Tuesday begins with William Byrde and Purcell and ends with Haydn and Mozart.

Arkady Bourstin, violinist, will give a recital Wednesday afternoon at Aeolian Hall. His principal numbers will be Brahms's Sonata in G, Bach's Adagio, and Fugue in G minor, and Bruch's Concerto in D minor. There will also be pieces by Rameau-Lieberson, Albert Spalding, Wagner-Wilhelmj, Cecil Burleigh, and Dvorak.

The program arranged by Dr. Muck for the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall comprises Brahms's Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Schumann's Overture, "Manfred," Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," and Dvorak's Overture, "Husitska." At its concert Saturday afternoon in the same place the organization will play Ravel's "Ma Mère l'Oye: 5 Pieces Enfantines," Loeffler's "La Mort de Tintagiles," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

Marcia van Dresser, who was heard last Spring on her return from Europe, will give a song recital in Aeolian Hall on Thursday evening. The soprano will sing songs in German, French, Italian, and English, among the composers represented being Brahms, Chausson, Wolf, Cyril Scott, Schindler, and Horsman. Kurt Schindler will assist at the piano.

With the assistance of the Russian Symphony Orchestra, Modest Altschuler, conductor, a concert will be given Friday evening in Aeolian Hall by Marguerite Beriza, soprano, of the Chicago Opera Company, and Genia d'Agarioff, baritone. Camille Decreus will play the piano accompaniments. Mme. Beriza will sing two groups of songs with piano and take part in a duet in Russian from Tschaikowsky's "Eugene Onegin" with Mr. d'Agarioff, the latter number to be accompanied by orchestra. The baritone will sing from "Boris Godunow" in Russian, accompanied by orchestra, and Mr. Altschuler and his men will play as orchestral numbers pieces from "Prince Igor," by Borodine; "Sadko," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, and Ippolitoff-Ivanoff's "Armenian Rhapsody."

Clara Clemens-Gabrilowitsch will devote herself entirely to songs by Russian composers at her recital in Aeolian Hall Saturday afternoon, though the texts will be in German and English. There will be two songs by Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who will play the contralto's accompaniments, and groups of songs by Rubinstein, Tschaikowsky, Glinka, Borddine, Rachmaninoff, and Arensky.

Arthur Herschmann, baritone, assisted by Richard Hageman at the piano, will give a song recital in Aeolian Hall on Saturday evening. Mr. Herschmann will sing four groups of songs in Italian, French, German, and English. In addition to works of Faure, Hue, Paulin, Bach, Wolf and others, the baritone will sing, among other numbers, "Twilight," by W. R. Cowles, "Her Eyes Twin Pools," Burleigh, "Give Me the Sea," Woodman, and "Buona Zaza," by Leoncavallo.

BOSTON OPERA REPERTOIRE

The second and final week of the season of the Boston Grand Opera Company and the Pavlowa Ballet Russe at the Manhattan Opera House, under the direction of Max Rabinoff, will begin tomorrow night. Conspicuous in the list of operas to be performed is "Tosca," which will bring forward as a specially engaged artist Mme. Olive Fremstad.

Mme. Fremstad's appearance Wednesday evening will mark her first portrayal of the role of Tosca in this city since December, 1912, when she was heard in it at the Metropolitan Opera House. The performance will mark the first appearance here of Giovanni Zenatello as Mario Cavaradossi, and George Baklanoff will sing the rôle of Baron Scarpia. Agide Jacchia will be the conductor. Following "Tosca," Mme. Pavlowa and her ballet will appear in "Snow Flakes," danced to Tschaikowsky's "Nut Cracker" music.

On Monday evening "Otello" will be given, with Luisa Villani, Giovanni Zenatello, and George Baklanoff in the leading rôles, and Roberto Moranzoni conducting.

Tuesday evening's opera will be "Madama Butterfly," the cast including the Japanese prima donna soprano, Tamaki Miura. Riccardo Martin will sing the rôle of Pinkerton, Thomas Chalmers will be Sharpless, and Elvira Leveroni and Paolo Ananian will have the two remaining important characters. Agide Jacchia will conduct.

The Wednesday matinée will bring forward two ballets and divertissements, with Mme. Pavlowa and the entire Imperial Ballet Russe.

Thursday night "Carmen" will be presented under the conductorship of Roberto Moranzoni, with Maria Gay in the title rôle, Riccardo Martin as Don José, José Mardones as Escamillo, May Scheider as Micaela, and Paolo Ananian, Alfred Kaufmann, and others, in the remaining rôles. In this opera Mme. Pavlowa will be seen in all the solo dances and with the Ballet Russe will present for the second time the Spanish dances of Bizet.

"L'Amore dei Tre Re" will have its second performance of this engagement on Friday evening, again under the baton of Roberto Moranzoni, and with Luisa Villani, Edoardo Ferrari-Fontana, George Baklanoff, and José Mardones in the four rôles which they sang last week.

At the Saturday matinée "Pagliacci" will be given its first performance during this engagement, and will serve to introduce for the first time with this company the English lyric soprano, Maggie Teyte, who is to have the rôle of Nedda. Giovanni Zenatello will sing Canio, and the Tonio will be George Baklanoff. After the Leoncavallo opera Delibes's ballet, "Coppelia," in which Mme. Pavlowa made her début in this country at the Metropolitan Opera House, will be given. This ballet, like all the others, is under the musical conductorship of Adolf Schmid.

The farewell performance on Saturday evening will bring forward "Madama Butterfly," with the same cast as above, followed by "Snow Flakes."

BROOKLYN MUSIC.

The first of the Boston Symphony series in Brooklyn will take place Friday evening in the Opera House of the Academy of Music with Mme. Melba as assisting artist. The orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's Symphony No. 8; Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." Mme. Melba will sing a Handel aria and two others from "The Marriage of Figaro." William J. Henderson will give a lecture on the program Thursday afternoon at 4.

Mischa Elman will give a recital in the Academy of Music on Thursday evening, Nov. 18, and Kitty Cheatham will give one of her programs at the same place on the following Saturday afternoon.

The first of the season's Biltmore Friday morning musicales will be given this week at the hotel, the artists for the occasion being Mme. Marie Rappold and Antonio Scotti of the Metropolitan Opera Company and Josef Hofmann, pianist. Mr. Hofmann will play two groups of smaller compositions. Mme. Rappold will sing Liszt's "Die Lorelei" and a group of songs in German and English, while Mr. Scotti will sing the Prologue from "Pagliacci" and two songs by Tosti, appearing also with Mme. Rappold in a duet from "Don Giovanni."

A fourth series of the Salon Musicale will begin Friday evening at Carnegie Chamber Music Hall. The artist will be Phadrig Ago'n, dramatic soprano, who will, in costume, sing numbers from several operas.

Walter Damrosch, conductor of the Symphony Society of New York, will give the first of his explanatory talks at the piano on the programs of his orchestra's concerts. It will take place tomorrow afternoon at the Cosmopolitan Club before the members of the Music Lovers' Club.

A feature of the concert to be given by the Order of Rostradamus in the Hotel Astor this afternoon will be the first performance of a new war song, "Soldatenlied, 1915," composed by I. S. Langstroth to a poem by Zuckerman, a poet who has fallen on the battlefield in the war. Otto Goritz, the baritone of the Metropolitan, will sing it, accompanied by four trombones. Other artists who will appear are Margarete Ober, Johannes Sembach, Marie Mattfeld, Carl Braun, Robert Leonhardt, Carl Schlegel, Rosina Van Dyck, Carl Friedberg, Willem Willeke, Edward Rechlin, Johanna Gadski, and Frieda Hempel. The proceeds will go to the widows and orphans of soldiers in the Teutonic armies.

OTHERS TO BE HEARD.

The program for Samuel A. Baldwin's free organ recital at City College at 4 o'clock this afternoon is as follows: Suite in E minor, Borowski; "The Question" and "The Answer," Wolstenholme; Prelude and Fugue in D, Bach; "Angelus," and Canzone, Renaud; Toccata in D and Cantilene du Soir, Kinder; Humoreske, Dvorak, and Overture: "Oberon," Weber. On Wednesday afternoon at the same hour he will play Sonata No. 1 in F minor, Mendelssohn; Largo from Sonata, Op. 2 No. 2, Beethoven; Prelude and Fugue in B minor, Bach; "Meditation," Harker; Toccata in A, MacMaster; Melody in E, Rachmaninoff, and Theme and Variations in A flat, Thiele.

PLANS OF THE MUSICIANS.

The Philharmonic Society will not be heard in this city during the coming week, as the orchestra, with its conductor, Josef Stransky, is making its annual tour through New England. At its concerts in Carnegie Hall on Nov. 18 and 19 the Philharmonic will produce a novelty, Arnold Schoenberg's "Pelleas and Melisande," a symphonic poem after Maeterlinck's well-known drama, which also inspired Debussy to his opera. The technical difficulties of the piece are such that Conductor Stransky has had to arrange twenty rehearsals to insure adequate preparation. The score calls for over one hundred performers, and introduces numerous new orchestral effects. For the concerts of Nov. 11 and 12 Mr. Stransky has arranged a program devoted entirely to Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, the Spanish violoncellist, Pablo Casals, being the assisting artist.

Leopold Godowsky will give his second recital at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, Nov. 13. The program will be devoted to Chopin.

Ernest Schelling has completed a new orchestral work called "Fantasy in the Form of Variations," which is to have its first presentation by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the composer playing the piano part. Schelling is to appear in New York with the Boston Symphony and with the Philharmonic.

The Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Kunwald, on Friday evening, at Oxford, Ohio, will give a special concert for which the principal number on the program will be Edgar Stillman Kelley's "New England" Symphony. The interest in the concert lies in the fact that Mr. Kelley is a member of the faculty of the Western College for Women, at Oxford, and that he wrote the symphony while enjoying the fellowship of music at Western College. Oxford is a town of only a few thousand inhabitants, and it is very seldom that a symphony orchestra visits it. Dr. Kunwald was one of the first to recognize Mr. Kelley's composition, and the concert at Oxford is in the nature of a pilgrimage dictated by sentiment. Mr. Kelley and his wife, who is also a member of the faculty of Western College, will be honor guests at the performance.

Caroline Hudson-Alexander, who has been heard in New York in oratorio and concert, will give a song recital in Aeolian Hall on Monday afternoon, Nov. 15. The soprano's program will include songs in German, Italian, French, and English.

Harold Bauer and Pablo Casals will give a joint recital in Aeolian Hall on Saturday afternoon, Nov. 20.

George Copeland, pianist, who was heard twice in Aeolian Hall last season, is announced for a recital in the same hall on Wednesday afternoon, Nov. 24.

The first concert of the Flonzaley Quartet's subscription series will be given in Aeolian Hall on Tuesday evening, Nov. 30, the other dates being Jan. 25 and March 14. Messrs. Betti, Pochon, Ara, and d'Archambeau have recently returned from Saranac, where they put the finishing touches on their new répertoire for the season.

Arthur Shattuck, pianist, will give a recital at Aeolian Hall on Wednesday afternoon, Dec. 1.

Ernest Hutcheson, the Australian pianist, who was heard last season in a Bach concert that aroused interest, is planning an orchestral concert to be given in Aeolian Hall on the afternoon of Saturday, Dec. 4.

David Mannes will speak on "The Child and Music" at the annual meeting of the Federation for Child Study at 2 West Sixty-fourth Street on Wednesday at 3 P. M. Admission will be free.

Pays $330 for Single Seat.

The largest price for a single ticket for the Polish Victims' Relief Fund recital, given by Mr. Paderewski at Carnegie Hall, was paid by the Musicians' Club of New York, of which Walter Damrosch is President. This club sent a check of $330 for one parquet seat. This amount was subscribed by the members as a small tribute of their great admiration for Mr. Paderewski and the cause for which he is devoting his genius.

Zuro Company on the Bowery.

Louis Zuro has completed arrangements for an opera season at the Thalia Theatre which will open on Friday evening with a performance of "Carmen." Among the artists engaged are Leda Errera, an Italian dramatic soprano; Miss Auld, a coloratura soprano; Maud Santley, mezzosoprano; Giocomo Mazuroff, a Russian dramatic tenor who is here on leave of absence, having been wounded during the siege of Przemysl; Luigi Samolli, dramatic tenor, and Ignacio Del Castillo, formerly of the Boston Opera Company, one of the conductors. At the Saturday matinée "La Traviata" will be given and on Saturday evening "Aida." The operas on Sunday are, in the afternoon, "Lucia," and at night, "Carmen."

Tonight at the Century.

Sylvester Schaeffer, the German entertainer, who does many things fairly well, will appear at the concert tonight at the Century. James J. Corbett will tell some of his experiences on his recent Australian tour, and the Balalaika Orchestra will play.

QUERIES AND ANSWERS

Readers of The Times are particularly requested to read the following before sending queries to the Query Department:

No answers can be given regarding legal or medical matters, card problems, propriety in dress, correctness of English sentences, and values of stamps and coins; nor to questions of a trivial character or of concern only to the questioner.

To receive attention every question must bear the name and address of the person sending it. This does not necessarily mean that the name will be published when the question is answered; only the initials will be used if the questioner so desires. No attention will be paid to queries to which the name and address of the sender are not appended.

Hundreds of letters are received by this department, so that it is obviously impossible to answer all of them immediately. In many cases there must be a certain amount of unavoidable delay.

Rosae Crucis.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The organization known as Rosae Crucis is in no way connected with the Societas Rosicruciana. The complete name of the former organization is the Ancient and Mystical Order Rosae Crucis. It has borne this name for several centuries. This order was founded in Egypt in 1040 B. C., and has lodges in every land. Recently the order was established in this country and has here a Supreme Council. The Grand Lodge is in New York City and branch lodges are being established in other cities. It permits both men and women to be members and to hold office on an equal footing. It is nonsectarian, though all must freely profess a belief in a Supreme Deity. The Societas Rosicruciana is a semi-Masonic organization similar to the eighteenth degree of Freemasonry and while being a testimony to the value of the Rosaecrucian philosophies, it has not the same initiations, symbols, teachings or purposes, and in all foreign countries is limited to Masons in membership. H. SPENCER LEWIS,
Grand Master General, A. M. O. R+C.

Feminism.

I. H.—Would it be possible to give me through the columns of your paper a concise definition of the feminist movement and philosophy as contrasted with the suffrage movement and philosophy?

"Feminism" is so inclusive a term, and connotes such different emphasis, not only in different countries, but in different social groups, and under differing economic conditions, that it is difficult to offer a "concise definition." Briefly the object of the feminist movement is the complete emancipation of woman and the attainment of the best possible conditions for her existence. Omitting mention of the claim for equal franchise rights, which usually is, but may not be, emphasized, the feminist aim includes everything which may work for the betterment of woman and of woman's place in the world, as wife and mother, as industrial worker, in professional or business life, in social and civic work. This includes improvement in marriage and property laws; in the recognition of woman as an equal partner, and not a subordinate, in the home; in opportunities for all higher and professional education, in all laws and customs having to do with the industrial labor of women and children. More advanced feminist theories urge the State endowment of motherhood, the abolition of "illegitimacy" so that the father of a child born of an unmarried mother must be wholly or partly responsible for the child's care and education, and other drastic laws, some of which have been adopted in varying degrees in different parts of the world. Other phases of feminist philosophy have to do with matters of health, social life, dress reform.

Germans and Jews.

S. A. W.—Will you be kind enough to answer the following questions: Is it true that the Germans closed their colleges to Jews from Russia? What is the method of capital punishment in Germany, and is it true that two women were decapitated there a year or two ago? Is it not a fact that Jacob Schiff offered a million marks for a college to be opened in Frankfort, Germany, with the understanding that Jewish Professors would be allowed to lecture, but that the Germans could not possibly comply with this offer? Please confirm the fact that a few years ago an Austrian Colonel (I think his name was Reidel) sold Government papers to Russian spies and committed suicide after the treason was discovered.

The regular method of capital punishment for criminals in Germany is decapitation. Beheading is also the method for putting prisoners to death, who have been so condemned, in France.

There are already a number of Jewish scholars occupying important chairs in the University of Frankfort, and Jews are allowed to teach and lecture in German universities. We are informed on the best authority that the rumor regarding an offer from Mr. Schiff to Frankfort, and its refusal, is absolutely without foundation.

Many cases of espionage and alleged treason in European countries have been reported in the papers in the past few years. We have no record of any case under the name of Reidel.

In regard to Russian Jewish students in German universities, the facts are as follows: On account of the restrictions on higher education for Jews in Russia a large number of Jewish young men attend the universities of Germany, Switzerland, and France especially, and those of a number of other European countries. This number has been increasing so greatly in recent years that the proportion of Jewish students in German universities became noticeable and aroused a great deal of anti-Semitic feeling. This caused a number of strikes on the part of the German students in German universities, in protest against the admission of Russian-Jewish students. A number of students' riots also occurred, and there was at least one murder. The whole matter was finally arranged by the governments of the various universities, which established certain restrictions operating against the admission of Russian-Jewish students. But it is not accurate to say that Russian-Jewish students were expelled from German universities at any time.

The Confederate States.

L. E. L.—At the time of the civil war were the Confederate States recognized by any of the powers? If so, by what country?

The Confederate States were not recognized by any of the powers. At the time of the Confederate victory of Manassas, the United States feared that England, France, and Germany would—one or all—recognize the Confederate States.

Equal Guardianship.

R.—Will you please tell me just what States have equal guardianship laws—giving women equal guardianship of their children? Are there such laws in all the woman suffrage States? Are they only in these States?

Women have equal guardianship of their children in all the equal suffrage States—the "complete suffrage" States of California, Washington, Oregon, Idaho, Nevada, Utah, Arizona, Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, and Kansas, and the "limited suffrage" State of Illinois. Equal guardianship laws also exist in the "male suffrage" States of Massachusetts, New York, Connecticut, Iowa, Kentucky, Maine, Minnesota, Nebraska, and New Hampshire, and in the District of Columbia. Of the States which have equal guardianship laws but are not "woman suffrage" States women have school suffrage in Massachusetts, New York, Connecticut, Iowa, Kentucky, Minnesota, Nebraska, and New Hampshire; in Iowa they have municipal suffrage as well, upon any proposition to vote bonds or increase tax levies.

Voters in Manhattan.

S. GOLDSTEIN.—Will you please tell me how many voters have registered in the Borough of Manhattan for the coming election?

The registered number of voters in Manhattan, for Tuesday's election, is 451,700.

The Day of the Week.

R. M. MERRIMAN sends the following:

The following rule for finding the day of the week for any given date is more convenient than the one given by you in your issue of Oct. 17, for the reason that no tables are required and it can be easily memorized.

Let Y stand for the year and D for the day of the year, then add the following, neglecting fractions:

$$Y + D + \frac{Y-1}{4} - \frac{Y-1}{100} + \frac{Y-1}{400}$$

Divide the sum found by 7; the remainder indicates the day of the week: 0=Saturday, 1=Sunday, 2=Monday, 3=Tuesday, &c.

For example, for June 4, 1839:

D= 155

$\frac{Y-1}{4} = 464$

$\frac{4}{400} = 4$

2482

$\frac{Y-1}{100} = 18$

7)2464=Sum

352 and no remainder, which indicates Saturday.

"Question Three."

SUBSCRIBER.—Will you kindly explain the scope of "Question Number Three," on which we are to vote on Nov. 2?

A vote "Yes" on Question 3 is a vote in favor of the following provisions:

A centralization of assessment of real estate within the counties whenever such a plan is approved by the voters of a county;

A centralization, made possible through legislation, of the assessment of personal property;

Permission to the Legislature to vest the assessment of the real property of public utility corporations in the State Board of Tax Commissioners, which now assesses their franchises, thus eliminating the frequent evasions due to separate assessment.

A Correction.

HELENA HILL WEED asks that the following correction be made: In a recent issue an unfortunate oversight placed the number of States and Territories which have enfranchised their women at nine. Twelve is the correct number, as follows: Wyoming in '69, Colorado in '93, Idaho in '96, Utah in '96, Washington in '10, California in '11, Arizona in '12, Kansas in '12, Oregon in '12, Alaska in '13, Nevada in '14, Montana in '14. The Query Column is requested to add that, though every equal suffrage State and nation has the power to do so, not one has ever taken the suffrage from its women by act of the people.

Average Speed of Trains.

CHARLES HOUSE.—A says that there are not on an average one in fifty trains in America which average thirty-five miles an hour on their run. B contradicts this. A says all trains includes passenger, express, and local, freight, mail, milk, and every train run on a regular schedule. B says "trains" means only passenger trains.

A railroad official informs the Query Column that express freight trains run on an average of more than thirty-five miles per hour; that passenger express trains also average more than thirty-five miles per hour. Local passenger and local freight trains run on an average of less than thirty-five miles per hour. All trains, irrespective of their class (whether passenger or freight) are run on schedule, so that it will be readily seen that "all trains" means every class of train run over the railroad's tracks.

Population of London and New York.

E. M. CHAPMAN, C. H. HENRY HAMILTON, KATHLEEN M. KENNEDY, and MAX E. NICHOLS.—What is the population of New York and London?

The population of New York, including the boroughs of Manhattan, Brooklyn, Bronx, Queens, and Richmond, according to the recently completed State enumeration is 5,068,222. These figures are said to be disappointing, as the Health Department's estimate for the year 1915 was 5,806,532. "Greater New York" is generally taken to mean all the boroughs of New York. The population of the part of London, known as the City, or the County of London, is 4,522,964. "Greater London" includes the metropolitan and city police districts and its population is 7,252,963.

Reading Menu-Card French.

JOHN BURNS.—I thought I understood French grammar in a general way, but menu-card French gets me. Is not the word "maitre" of masculine gender? Why then do I read "à la maitre d'hotel" on my menu? If "à la maitre," why not "à la gratin"? Why "petits pois françaises"? Aren't peas masculine in the French tongue?

"A la" on a menu is an abbreviation of "à la manière de," "in the manner or style of." The complete phrase would read "à la manière du maitre d'hotel." That is why "à la" is used indiscriminately on menus before masculine and feminine words. "Au gratin" means "browned" in cookery, and is literally "with crumbs or gratings." Other uses of "au" in cookery are "café au lait," (with milk), "tarte aux pommes," (apple pie), &c. "A la manière" is also understood before "française" when peas are served as "petits pois françaises," which means "peas in the French style," not "French peas."

Captain Dreyfus.

In reference to a recent inquiry about Major Dreyfus, "A Correspondent" sends information that the name in France is a common one and that in the French Army list for 1913 there are no less than twenty-nine officers of that name. References to "Captain Dreyfus" in the newspapers therefore, he says, probably do not refer to the well-known Major, who, however, is in active service in the artillery.

Age of Elephants and Parrots.

H. G. WENDT.—How long do elephants and parrots live?

Eardley-Wilmot, in his "Life of an Elephant," says that these animals live 100 years under favorable circumstances. R. Lydekker in his "Great and Small Game of India" says of the Indian elephant that its age depends upon its teeth.

Definite information as to the age of parrots is hard to find. In a work on "Parrots in Captivity" one black Madagascar specimen in the London Zoo is mentioned, which was presented to the society full grown in 1831, and was still alive and well in 1894. Several others about 20 years old are mentioned.

Hospital Treatment for Aliens.

GUS SILVERLING.—Can a foreign-born person who has not declared his intention of becoming a citizen and who has been in this country from three to five years receive free medical attendance or treatment for tuberculosis from the city or State, or would he be deported to the country of his birth?

Many alien patients are received, advised, and treated at the city hospitals and dispensaries every day, quite irrespective of whether they have taken steps to become citizens of this country or not.

Hudson Street Hospital.

W. BURNS.—Is the House of Relief at Hudson and Jay Streets maintained by the city or State of New York? Is a person suddenly taken ill supposed to pay the Department of Charities or any other institution for care or relief rendered?

The Hudson Street House of Relief is under the maintenance of the Society of the New York Hospital. The various city hospitals have different arrangements in the matter of payment. In some patients pay what they can, in others the treatment and care is free; most of them have a large proportion of free cases.

Finger Prints.

READER.—How can I record and keep finger prints?

Impressions are taken in two ways, plain and rolled. The second method gives a clearer print. To take a rolled impression the butt of the finger is placed upon a tin slat over which a tiny film of printer's ink has been spread, the plane of the nail being at right angles to the plane of the slab, and the finger is then turned or rolled over until the butt surface, originally facing to the left, is now facing to the right. By this means the ridged surface is inked. Then the finger is rolled lightly on paper in the same way. Care must be taken not to press too heavily or the impression will be blurred. A very small quantity of ink must be used, the tin slab must be very clean or it will not spread evenly. A printer's roller is best for spreading the ink, which may be conveniently bought in collapsible tubes. The paper should be very white, and not too highly glazed. The whiteness is necessary in order to reproduce well if the prints are photographed. An ordinary ink pad, such as is used for rubber stamps, is convenient instead of the tin slab. The impressions of the different fingers are classified into those showing arches, loops, whorls, and composites of these forms. Rather large white cards, 11½ by 5 inches, are good for recording the impression of the whole four finger tips of one hand at once by plain pressure, and then each finger and the thumb by rolled pressure. Cards are readily indexed.

Sir Gilbert Parker.

M. L. L.—By whom was Sir Gilbert Parker knighted; when, and for what?

Sir Gilbert Parker was knighted in 1902 by King Edward VII. as recognition of his achievements as an author.

Population of Prussia.

J. L. DINKELSPIEL.—Would you be good enough to let me know what proportion of the population of Germany is Prussian?

In 1910 the population of the German Empire was 64,925,993, of which 40,165,219 belonged to Prussia. It was estimated in 1914 that the population of the empire had reached 67,812,000.

Five-Masted Schooner.

A DAILY READER.—What are the names of the masts on a five-masted schooner?

The names of the four masts are fore, main, mizzen, and jigger (sometimes spanker) mast. It has been found impossible to discover in books the name of the fifth mast. Perhaps a nautical reader of the column may enlighten you.

Bride's Carriage.

A CONSTANT READER.—M. claims that he pays for the carriage or automobile that calls for him as a bridegroom, for the minister, &c., and for the transportation of himself and the bride to the train after the ceremony. F. claims that she or the family pays for some of this. What is the usual custom?

It is usual for the bridegroom to provide all carriages connected with the ceremony, except the one which brings the bride to church, if it is a church wedding.

Chautauqua Salute.

Mrs. N. B. E. IRWIN writes that Bishop Vincent some years ago gave her in the following letter the original and correct version of the Chautauqua salute:

"The Chautauqua salute was first given at Chautauqua to a deaf-mute lecturer who had made a fine impression, and I suggested to Mr. Audin that our applause must appeal to his eyes. I suggested the handkerchief salute. The effect was wonderful."

Church Congregations.

W. B. CHESTERMAN and MARY C. BURKE.—Can you advise one of the number of church congregations in the United States?

The number of Adventist Churches is 2,547; Baptist, 57,364; Dunkard Brethren, 1,291; Plymouth Brethren, 403; River Brethren, 105; Buddhists, 74; Catholic Apostolic, 24; Catholic Eastern, 331; Catholic Western, 14,681; Christadelphians, 70; Christians, 1,182; Christian Catholic, (Dowie,) 17; Christian Scientist, 1,347; Christian Union, 27; Church of God, 595; Churches of the Living God, 68; Churches of the New Jerusalem, 157; Communistic Societies, 22; Congregational, 6,100; Disciples of Christ, 11,725; Evangelical Bodies, 2,600; Faith Associations, 146; Free Christian Zion Churches, 15; Friends, 1,167; Friends of the Temple, 3; German Evangelical Protestant, 66; German Evangelical Synod, 1,345; Jewish Congregations, 1,769; Latter Day Saints, 1,520; Lutherans, 16,010; Scandinavian Evangelical, 857; Mennonites, 786; Methodists, 61,523; Moravian bodies, 143; Nonsectarian Bible Faith, 204; Pentecostal bodies, 648; Presbyterians, 16,646; Protestant Episcopal, 7,890; Reformed, 2,763; Salvationists, 889; Schwenkfeeders, 6; Social Brethren, 17; Society of Ethical Culture, 6; Spiritualists, 2,000; Theosophical Societies, 145; United Brethren, 4,166; Unitarians, 477; Universalists, 707; Independent congregations, 879; total, (in 1913,) 223,735.

The Council of Jewish Women.

BROOKLYN.—Will you please tell me something about the Council of Jewish Women and how to become a member?

The National Council of Jewish Women is organized for the purpose of bringing about a union of Jewish women for conference and work; furthering united efforts in behalf of Judaism, and in the work of social betterment through religion, philanthropy, and education. Its program of work is issued triennially. Its local work is done through its various sections in fifty-seven cities and twenty-four States and Canada. The Brooklyn Section of the Council of Jewish Women maintains aid for female immigrants, probation work in connection with the Children's Court and correctional institutions, and volunteer visitors for blind and to State institutions. Detailed information may be obtained from the national program or by application to the President of the section.

Swiss Titles.

H. W. H.—Will you kindly let me know if any hereditary titles exist in Switzerland? I know none exist before the law, but I wish to know if there are any that are recognized socially. Any information on this interesting subject will be appreciated.

Generally speaking, Swiss titles have no recognition in Switzerland. All family privileges and titles in Switzerland have been abolished through the constitution of the Swiss Confederation of 1848 and the revised Constitution of 1874. The paragraph in question reads: "All Swiss are equal before the law. There are in Switzerland neither subjects, nor privileges of position of birth, of persons, or of families." Socially, distinction is to be made between three kinds of nobility: The old, historic hereditary titles, new titles bestowed upon Swiss by foreign monarchs or the Pope, and titles of foreign noblemen residing in Switzerland. If a Swiss of the younger generation should call himself "Baron," "Count," or the like, readopting a title which had existed in the past in his family, he would render himself ridiculous in Swiss society. There are said to be left, however, some few very conservative families which have retained their ancient titles socially; these live apart from modern Swiss social life, having social intercourse only among themselves and with foreign families of the old nobility. These families, however, which have never identified themselves with the Swiss Republic, or its society, are dying out. As to the second class—those whose titles have been bestowed upon them by foreign monarchs or the Pope after the adoption of title and family privileges in Switzerland—these, on taking absent themselves from modern Swiss society, and live usually in foreign countries. Titles of foreigners residing in Switzerland are socially recognized, as a matter of courtesy and out of respect for foreign customs and etiquette. The acceptance of titles of nobility, decorations, &c., of foreign Governments or monarchs is, by Article 12 of the Swiss Constitution, prohibited to members of the Federal authorities; all Federal employés and officials, all officers, and soldiers of the Swiss Army. As every Swiss is a soldier by law—except those who are physically or mentally unfitted—the acceptance of a foreign title of nobility practically means self-expatriation.

American Citizens of French Birth.

S. S. S.—Does the French Government and law claim that, no matter if a subject becomes a citizen of another country, once a Frenchman is always a Frenchman, if France should call her citizens?

There is no naturalization treaty between France and the United States. The French Government rarely gives consent for a Frenchman of military age to throw off his allegiance to his native country. If released from all military obligations in France, or if the authorization of the French Government was obtained beforehand, naturalization of a former French citizen in the United States is accepted by the French Government; but a Frenchman naturalised abroad without the consent of his Government, and who at the time of his naturalization was still subject to military service in the active army or the reserve of the active army, is held to be amenable to the French military laws. A Frenchman naturalized abroad after having passed the age of service in the active army and the reserve, nevertheless continues on the military list until he has had his name struck off the rolls, which may usually be done by sending his naturalization certificate through the United States Embassy to the proper French authorities.

Confederate Money.

L. E. L.—After the civil war, did the Union offer to redeem Confederate money?

No.

Divorce in Kansas.

ALGERNON LEE.—Will you kindly inform me whether the present lax divorce law of Kansas was enacted before or after suffrage was extended to the women of that State?

The causes for divorce in Kansas in 1915 and the time of residence required are the same as they were when the United States Government compiled its digest of marriage and divorce laws in 1908-9, from Compilations of Laws, 1885; Laws of 1889, 1905; Daesaler's General Statutes of 1901, and when Keeser quoted the laws of Kansas in his "Marriage and Divorce," 1906. Suffrage was granted to the women of Kansas in 1912.

French Churches.

M. L. BISCHEL sends the following list of French churches in New York, which was omitted in the answer to A. Marchant, published recently: The French Evangelical Church, 126 West Sixteenth Street, (this church was started in 1848, and held services in the Dutch Reformed Church on Fulton Street;) Eglise Notre Dame, 114 Riverside Drive; St. Jean Baptiste, Seventy-sixth Street; Notre Dame de la Misericorde, 169 West Washington Place.

Immigrants' Names.

E. C.—Will you kindly advise me if it is usual or considered proper for immigrants to change their names in going from one country to another? For instance, I have been informed that many Irish emigrants to England or America change the Gaelic name of Killeen to the supposed English equivalent of Churchill.

It is possible, of course, for immigrants to change their names on coming to this country, and obtain legal permission to be known by shorter or more "American" names. But it cannot be called usual or customary.

The Steamship Republic.

READER.—Will you please tell me the date when the White Star liner Republic sailed from Naples to New York in June, 1906, and also the date when she sank.

The steamship Republic was lost on Saturday, Jan. 23, 1909. She did not sail from Naples to New York in June, 1906; she sailed from New York to Naples May 31 of that year, and left Naples, en route for Boston, July 1.

State Constitutions.

In reply to the question of "Constitutional" concerning the adoption of State Constitutions by proclamation instead of by popular vote, "H. C. F." writes:

The existing Constitution of Virginia, succeeding the so-called "Underwood Constitution," was proclaimed in 1902 by a convention without any popular ratification. The Reconstruction, or Underwood, Constitution contained an article prescribing two alternative modes of its own amendment. One was by popular election of a convention empowered to revise the Constitution and amend the same. The other was by proposals originating in the Legislature and submitted, after successive legislative approvals, to the people. The first method was employed in 1902. It was imported into the Underwood Constitution from the New York Constitution of 1846. There were many "carpet-bag" New Yorkers in the Virginia Convention that framed the post-bellum Charter. This particular provision in the contemned Underwood product was an excellent one, in alternative. Therefore the method referred to by your inquirer was constitutional at one time in New York, even though not used.

American-Born Children.

E. J.—I understand that children born in the United States are considered American citizens even though their parents are not naturalized. I also understand that England claims those children born of British parents in America. We are English and our children were born here. What is the status of our children in this matter?

All children born in the United States are considered citizens of the United States. They need not claim or use their American citizenship, however, if they do not want to, and if they choose to return to their parents' native country and give up the American citizenship that is their birthright on American soil, they may do so. The choice in this matter lies with the child. It is advisable for such persons, when they attain their majority—if they wish to remain in America as American citizens—to go before a notary public and state they wish to register as American citizens, and that they choose the citizenship of this country rather than that of their parents' birth.

J. B. Haggin.

O. B. P.—I have been much interested in reading about the late J. B. Haggin, and I should be much obliged if you could tell me how he made his fortune.

The late James B. Haggin acquired his fortune in mining enterprises in the West.

A Nephew.

E. C. S.—Will you please tell me whether a nephew who has his uncle's name is usually known as "2d" or "Jr."?

A man whose name is the same as his uncle's usually adds "2d" to his name.

Women and Citizenship.

R. H.—Will you please tell me whether by law an American girl who is engaged to a foreigner who has taken out his first papers, and who marries him before his naturalization is completed, loses her American citizenship while he is waiting for his second papers?

A woman must by law take the citizenship of her husband; and as a man is not an American citizen until he is fully naturalized and has his "second papers," his American born wife must lose her American citizenship in the interim.

Motor Parkways.

J. M.—Kindly inform me how many miles long is the Motor Parkway on Long Island, and how large is Tuxedo Park. Are they private grounds?

The Motor Parkway is about forty-five miles long. The area of Tuxedo Park is about 1,000 acres. Both are privately owned.

Elephants.

J. L. K.—I understand that there is a difference in the number of toes of the African and Asiatic elephants, one having five toes and the other three. How many toes do the young have when the breeds are crossed?

The breeds of Asiatic and African elephants are not crossed. We have referred the question to a zoologist, who tells us that such crossing has never taken place to his knowledge. The African elephant has two toes on its rear feet and three on its front feet, the Indian three on its rear feet and four on its front feet.

A Noted Composer.

E. W. F.—Please give me some information about Mrs. H. H. A. Beach.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, whose unmarried name was Amy March Cheney, is the daughter of Charles Abbott and Clara Imogene March Cheney, and was born in Henniker, N. H., Sept. 5, 1867. Her early education was under her mother, and she later studied piano and harmony under various masters, and fugue, form, counterpoint, and instrumentation alone with textbooks. She married Henry Harris Aubrey Beach Dec. 2, 1885. She played in recitals and concerts from 1885, but from 1895 on her main work has included composition as well as playing. Her compositions include "Mass in E Flat," "The Rose of Avontown," "Gaelic Symphony," "Festival Jubilate," "The Minstrel and the King," "Sylvania," "Help Us, O God," "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra," "Jephthah's Daughter," "The Sea Fairies," "The Chambered Nautilus," "Quintet for Piano and Strings," "Serviceda A," and also many songs. She lives in Boston.

Citizenship.

J. T.—Please settle the following situation for me: A, born in Russia, came to this country in 1880—at the age of 5—with his father, who was a Russian subject, and who subsequently became naturalized as a citizen of the United States. Is the son, A, an American citizen?

Children who are minors when their father is naturalized become American citizens by virtue of his naturalization.

Gilbert Stuart.

E. W. F.—Will you please tell me something about Gilbert Stuart?

Gilbert Stuart (1755-1828) was born in Narragansett, R. I., the son of a snuff-grinder. At the age of 15, without any instruction whatever, he began to paint portraits that attracted the attention of a young Scotch artist named Alexander, who took him to Scotland in 1772. In 1774 he returned to America, where he remained for a year. He went back to London in 1775, and for short time he played the organ in a small church in that city. In 1778 he entered the studio of Benjamin West as a pupil, but later set up a studio of his own, and remained working there for some years. He came back to this country once more in 1792, and painted many portraits in New York and Philadelphia, among them the famous "1795 Washington." In the year 1806 he settled in Boston. His fame rests largely upon his many portraits of Washington.

Corra Harris.

E. W. F.—I should like to have some information about Corra Harris.

Corra May White Harris was born at Farm Hill, Ga., March 17, 1869, the daughter of Tinsley Rucker and Mary Elizabeth Matthews White. She was educated at home. She married the Rev. Lundy Howard Harris Feb. 8, 1887; her husband died Sept. 18, 1910. She began writing for the magazines in 1899. She is the author of "A Circuit Rider's Wife," 1910; "Eva's Second Husband," 1910; "The Recording Angel," 1911; "In Search of a Husband," 1912, and, with Paul Elmer More, "The Jessica Letters," 1904. Her home is in Nashville, Tenn.

Policemen and Firemen.

T. S.—Will you please tell me which department, the Fire Department or that of Police, had lost more men in the performance of their duty up to the year 1907?

The police records go back to 1857, and show that sixty-three men were killed in the performance of their duty from then until 1907 inclusive. The City Fire Department was organized in 1865, and up to Jan. 1, 1907, 112 members of the uniformed force had lost their lives in the performance of duty.

John Philip Sousa.

S. R.—Will you please tell me John Philip Sousa's right name? I have heard that he is really a Greek, named So.

John Philip Sousa is the bandmaster's name, as given in "Who's Who." His father was a Portuguese musician named Antonio Sousa, and his mother's name was Elizabeth Trinkhaus Sousa. John Philip Sousa was born in Washington, D. C.

Marabout Feathers.

A. D. A.—Does the taking of feathers from the marabout stork—the marabout feathers of commerce—involve the bird's death?

It is not possible to get the feathers from the marabout stork without killing the bird. The feathers are taken from underneath the bird, between the legs and the tail. The marabout stork is a wild bird, and it is impossible to catch it and get the feathers from it without killing it.

United States Submarines.

SAMUEL SCHEINDLINGER.—Is there a United States submarine built or being built that will be able to travel 5,000 continuous miles without making any stops for fuel or provisions?

All submarines now being built for the United States Navy are built to carry sufficient fuel oil to allow for traveling 5,000 miles without re-fueling.

Edward VII. in New York.

J. E. O.—Will you please tell me in what year the British Prince of Wales, afterward King Edward VII., visited the United States? I claim it was in 1860. A friend says 1870.

C. W. E.—Please tell me at what hotel the Prince of Wales stopped when he was in New York in 1839, whether it is still standing, where it is, and if it is still used as a hotel.

The Prince of Wales, later Edward VII. of England, came to the United States in 1860, as Baron Renfrew. He was in New York from Oct. 11 to Oct. 15, and stayed at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, at the corner of Fifth Avenue, Twenty-fifth Street, and Broadway. The hotel was demolished in 1908 to make way for the present Fifth Avenue Building. The Prince sailed for home Oct. 21, from Portland, Me.

Great Jones Street.

E. K. J.—Will you kindly tell me for whom Great Jones Street, New York City, was named?

Great Jones Street was named for Chief Justice David Jones. Jones Street, on the opposite (west) side of the city, was named for the Gardner Jones family. The Jones Street on the east side was called Great Jones to distinguish it.

Secretary Lansing.

ARTHUR FALLON.—Secretary Lansing is a native-born American. His birthplace was Watertown, N. Y.

The Washington Death Mask.

I. A. B.—The Washington death mask in the Metropolitan Museum was made by Houdon.

Woodlawn Cemetery.

ANXIOUS.—Will you kindly tell me the area of Woodlawn Cemetery, the year when it was made into a cemetery, and whether it is consecrated ground?

Woodlawn Cemetery was incorporated as a cemetery in the year 1863. Its area is about 400 acres. Certain parts of the cemetery are made consecrated ground when certain burials are made in lots in the cemetery.

Transatlantic Passage in 1840.

A. D. A.—What was the cost of a first-class passage across the Atlantic in one of the best clipper sailing ships of seventy-five years ago?

The price of a passage "first class," of course, in one of the best clipper sailing ships crossing the Atlantic seventy-five years ago was about twenty-five English pounds. That amount, then, as it does now, approximated $125.

Cyanide of Potassium.

GEORGE M. BRUCE.—Will you kindly inform me which is the more deadly drug, the red cyanide of potassium or the yellow cyanide of potassium?

The poisonous drug known as cyanide of potassium is always white. The red and yellow cyanides are iron cyanides; ferro potassium cyanide is yellow and ferri potassium cyanide is red. But these are not deadly poisonous drugs.

William the Conqueror.

G. B.—Please inform me through your columns if William the Conqueror was French, if he had any French blood, and if he did anything for France.

William the Conqueror was Duke of Normandy before he became King of England. He was the son of Robert the Devil, Duke of Normandy, and Arlette, daughter of a tanner of Falaise. Long before William's time the Normans had established themselves as permanent residents on the west coast of France, and under Charles the Simple, King of France, (893-929,) the Norman leader Rollo became the feudal and hereditary duke under the French King, and married the French King's daughter. After 1066 William devoted himself to ruling England, and it is with England that he is associated, not with Norman France.

Home Rule.

G. C. S.—Will you please give me a brief explanation or outline of the home rule situation in Ireland?

On April 11, 1912, Mr. Asquith introduced in the Government of Ireland bill, asserting the supreme authority of the Imperial Parliament, but providing for a two-chamber Parliament for the internal Government of Ireland. The bill passed its third reading in the Commons Jan. 16, 1913; Jan. 30 it was rejected by the Lords. Sir Edward Carson's amendment excluding Ulster had meanwhile been rejected, and the Ulster movement against home rule in toto was growing in intensity. The bill passed the Commons for the second time July 17, 1913. When Parliament reopened in February, 1914, the Government announced its intention of passing the bill for the third time, without submitting it to a referendum vote, but in March Premier Asquith proposed that those counties of Ulster which were not in sympathy with home rule should be excluded for six years from the provisions of the act. The bill passed its third and last reading before the Commons May 25, 1914; radically modified, it passed the Lords on July 15. Five days later the Commons took up the amended and modified form of the bill for extended consideration. The King called a conference of all the leaders, which came to nothing, as none of the extremists would make any concessions for peace. On the following Sunday the famous Dublin riots occurred, in which four people were killed and between thirty and fifty wounded. So intense was the indignation in England and Ireland that Mr. Asquith announced that all consideration of home rule must be postponed until the excitement had died down. Two days later the European war broke out, and the question of home rule was indefinitely "shelved."

Woman Suffrage.

M. R. G.—Will you please answer the following questions: How many parades for woman suffrage have there been in New York City? What States grant women full suffrage and what States have partial or Presidential suffrage for women? If the suffrage amendment is defeated at the polls this year, how soon can it be voted on again, if approved by the Legislature as a referendum to the people?

The woman suffrage parade of Oct. 23 was the fifth to be held in New York City, the other four being in May, 1911; May, 1912; October, 1912, and May, 1913.

There is full suffrage for women in the States of California, Washington, Oregon, Idaho, Nevada, Utah, Arizona, Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, and Kansas; Presidential, municipal, and partial county suffrage in Illinois; and partial (principally school) suffrage in New York, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Vermont, Connecticut, Delaware, New Jersey, Ohio, Kentucky, Mississippi, Louisiana, Wisconsin, Iowa, Oklahoma, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, and New Mexico. The Territory of Alaska has extended the full franchise to women.

If the woman suffrage amendment is defeated at the polls on Nov. 2, it can, if passed as a referendum by the State Legislature, be voted upon again in two years.

Shadwell.

G. C. S.—What is the history of Shadwell, Va.? For whom was it named, and when was it founded?

Shadwell, Va., the birthplace of Thomas Jefferson, was not a town, but a farm. The site, in Albemarle County, is now marked by a station on the C. & O. railroad, and the present name is thus simply taken from the estate on which Jefferson was born.

Leading American Industries.

INQUIRER.—Please tell me which are the five largest businesses in the United States.

No figures or ratings are available as to the largest business enterprises of the United States that will include every kind of business. The five largest manufacturing industries, in the order of their values, are (1) slaughtering and meat packing, (2) foundry and machine shop products, (3) lumber and timber, (4) steel works and rolling mills, and (5) flour and grist mill products.

The National Desertion Bureau.

E. R. B.—Some time ago—early last Spring, I think—I noticed something in THE TIMES about the incorporation of a National Desertion Bureau, but I have lost the paper containing the information. Can you tell me something about it?

The National Desertion Bureau was incorporated Sept. 30 "to prevent wife and family desertion, to bring about the reunion of husbands with their wives and families, to study the social and economic causes and results of wife desertion, and to promote corrective legislation." Among the Directors named were Elkan Holzman, B. Tuska, B. G. Paskus, M. D. Waldeman, David M. Bressler, and Julius M. Mayer.

English Universities.

F. C.—I contend that Oxford University consists of a federation of smaller colleges, and that these all together form the University of Oxford, and that the organization of the University of Cambridge is the same; please state whether this is the case. At which of the colleges of Oxford was the present Prince of Wales educated?

Both Oxford and Cambridge Universities are made up of a number of different colleges. The present Prince of Wales was sent as a student to Magdalen College, Oxford.

Belva Lockwood.

T. F. C.—Will you kindly advise me what office Belva Lockwood, a prominent woman attorney, ran for in or about the year 1884?

Belva Lockwood was nominated in 1884 and 1888 as the candidate of the Equal Rights Party for the Presidency of the United States.

The Empire State.

A READER.—Will you kindly tell me why New York is called the Empire State?

New York was nicknamed the Empire State because of its size, wealth, and fertility.

Detroit Time.

A. J. MEINES.—The city of Detroit has been using Eastern time since May 16, 1915. The railroad still uses Central time.

QUERIES ON WAR MATTERS

Readers of The Times are particularly requested to read the following before reading queries to the Query Department:

To receive attention every question must bear the name and address of the person sending it. This does not necessarily mean that the name will be published when the question is answered; only the initials will be used if the questioner so desires. No attention will be paid to queries to which the name and address of the sender are not appended.

Hundreds of letters are received by this department, so that it is obviously impossible to answer all of them immediately. In many cases there must be a certain amount of unavoidable delay.

The Diplomatic Papers.

A. L. H.—We are trying to find information on the following: Why are the documents relating to the European war designated by a color for each nation, e. g., Austrian Red Book, French Yellow Book, &c.?

It has been the custom for many years to give diplomatic papers, in collections, such names as those of the "causes of the war" papers—White Papers, Red Book, &c. The "book" takes its title from the color in which it is bound, as our American city "Blue Books" do.

Kiao-Chau.

J. W.—Did the Japanese lose a warship at Kiao-Chau?

The Japanese cruiser Takachiho was sunk in Kiao-Chau Bay Oct. 18, 1914, by the German submarine S-90. Other naval events were as follows: Aug. 31, 1914, a German gunboat shelled an abandoned Japanese destroyer at Kiao-Chau; Oct. 1, there was fighting between German and Japanese fleets in Kiao-Chau Harbor; Oct. 3, a Japanese cruiser was blown up by a mine in Laoshan Bay; Oct. 28, the Emden sank a Japanese steamer; Nov. 11, a Japanese torpedo boat was sunk by a mine in Kiao-Chau Bay.

Submarine Submersion.

A. D.—Will you please explain in the Query Column how submarines are submerged and raised to the surface again?

When on the surface a submarine is in what is technically known as "light condition," with her water ballast tanks empty. When it is required to sink her so that only the tiny platforms or deck and the conning tower are above the surface water is let into these ballast tanks, and the additional weight causes the submarine to sink until her back is almost flush with the surface. This is known as the "awash" condition.

When traveling awash, the hatch covering the mouth of the conning tower must be screwed down and the submarine hermetically sealed, ready to sink. The total submersion of the submarine is accomplished by means of the vessel's propellers and rudders. A submarine has two or three pairs of rudders—vertical, to guide her to port or starboard, and horizontal, to cause her to dive and rise. She often has also two additional "fins," placed on each side of the fore part, to assist diving and rising. To sink the vessel, the horizontal rudders are deflected when the boat is proceeding at full speed, the bows are forced down, and the whole vessel slides under the surface, where it is held down by the action of the rudders on the water. When the propellers cease to revolve she automatically rises. To bring her to the surface it is only necessary to elevate the horizontal rudders, which brings the vessel to the awash condition, and then to blow out the water in the tanks with compressed air, which brings her at once to cruising condition.

Enemy Merchant Vessels.

L. C. NOR.—In case of war between the United States and Germany, what would be the situation in regard to the German vessels now interned here? Would they be confiscated by the United States or merely interned until the end of the war? Would we have to pay for them in case of seizure?

The Hague Convention regarding enemy merchant vessels in times of war provided that at the outbreak of hostilities these vessels should be allowed to depart to their home ports; but that if they did not or could not so depart, they were either to be returned at the end of the war or were to be paid for if requisitioned or confiscated. The United States was not a signatory to this convention, but there is every likelihood that the United States would abide by this convention in time of war.

The Goeben and Breslau.

E. F. S.—The two warships sold by Germany to Turkey were the Goeben and the Breslau. They left Genoa Aug. 7, were in the Dardanelles Aug. 8, and were flying the Turkish flag Aug. 13, 1914.

German Soldiers and Voters.

F. ROSSI.—How many men has Germany in the field? How many Socialists are there in Germany?

It is not possible at the present time to present accurate and specific figures of the number of men actually fighting in any army. At the outbreak of war the total armed strength of Germany was rated at 5,400,000 men, with an unorganized "reserve mass" available for duty of 2,581,000. These unorganized and untrained troops were, of course, not to be reckoned among the men to be sent to the field during the early months of the war, and may be counted on as available for service, and to offset losses now. The Socialist vote of Germany at the last election was approximately 3,500,000. There are 112 Socialist members of the Reichstag.

Locating Submarines.

W. H. D.—I should be interested to hear whether there is a device in force in the American Navy by which it is possible to foretell the position of a submarine within two or three miles of a vessel carrying such a device, by means of a bell ringing or any other announcement on board the vessel carrying such device.

Up to the present time all submarines of the United States Navy have been equipped with submarine bells and receivers. By means of these bells it is possible to communicate from one vessel to another when submarines are submerged, or between submarines and other vessels equipped with a submarine bell and receiver. With these bells it is possible to transmit a message, but it is impossible to tell the bearing and distance of the ship, except very approximately. Recently Fessenden oscillators, to accomplish the same purpose, have been installed in the United States submarines, and these instruments are used in the same way.

War Dates.

J. G. K., Jr.—Will you please tell me the dates of the capture of Lille, of the first capture of Lodz, and of the captures of Rheims, Königsberg and Tabriz?

Lille was reported taken by the Germans Aug. 26, and reoccupied by the French Aug. 27. It was recaptured by the Germans Oct. 13. Lodz was taken by German troops Dec. 6. Rheims was occupied by the Germans Sept. 4 and almost immediately retaken by the French. Its reobombardment by the Germans began Sept. 14, and it has been intermittently subject to attack ever since. Königsberg was invested by the Russians Aug. 29; they admitted that "their advance was checked" Sept. 2. Tabriz was captured by the Russians Jan. 30.

The Treaty of 1839.

Dr. D. K.—At any of The Hague conferences did or did not the United States become a party to guarantee the neutrality of Belgium? Was she a signatory to the "Scrap of Paper" guaranteeing Belgium's neutrality? What was her attitude or position toward this question?

The treaty of 1839, by which, on the 19th of April of that year, Prussia, France, England, Austria, and Russia declared themselves guarantors of the treaty concluded on the same day between the King of the Belgians and the King of the Netherlands, and which is of course the famous "Scrap of Paper" of the present war, was not signed by the United States, nor was the United States in any way concerned with the problem of the neutrality of the "buffer States" of northern Europe; the matter was one which was of interest to Belgium, Holland, and the signatory and protecting powers, and the United States had nothing to do with it in any way. The treaty provided that Belgium formed "an independent State of perpetual neutrality." That is, Belgium was forbidden, in case of war, to take the part of any of the belligerents, and was to be free from violation. The United States was a signatory to the "Convention Respecting the Rights and Duties of Neutral Powers and Persons in Case of War on Land," in the second Hague Conference of 1907, and there declared the territory of all neutral nations to be inviolable.

Books on Submarines.

D. H. MANNEY.—Standard works on the submarine are "Submarines of the World's Navies," by Charles W. Domoille-Fife, published by F. Griffiths in London in 1910, and his "Submarine, Mines, and Torpedoes in War," published in 1914; Clark Teitch's "A Modern Submarine," published 1912; Dommet's "Submarine Vessels"; H. C. Fyte's "Submarine Warfare" (1902). Among the many articles in periodical literature on the subject may be mentioned "The Submarine Vindicated" with a clear, large drawing of a periscope, in The Scientific American for Oct. 3, 1914; and "The Modern Submarine" in the same paper for July 3, 1915.

War's Losses.

A. P. NIPSEN.—What are the losses in killed, wounded, and captured of the French, British, and Russian forces? Also the percentage of Colonials?

The following figures were published on the first of August in this country. They were said to be computed from official and semi-official sources: France killed 400,000, wounded 700,000, prisoners and missing 300,000, total 1,400,000. Russia killed 733,000, wounded 1,082,000, prisoners and missing not including Warsaw campaign 770,000, total 3,485,000. Since the publication of these figures Russia is said to have lost heavily. On Sept. 14 the following official announcement was made in the House of Commons of British casualties: Total, 381,083; killed and died of wounds, officers, 4,965; men, 70,092; wounded, officers, 9,973; men, 241,086; missing officers, 1,501; men, 53,466. These figures were for the army only. On August 9 the Canadian casualties were announced in Ottawa to total 10,980, of which 1,877 were killed, 6,738 wounded and 2,065 missing. Canada was recently said to have sent 80,000 men to the front. Australian estimates have not been found.

Merchant Vessels.

E. BRADSTONE.—Is there any record of English merchant vessels being in any German harbors and retained at the outbreak of war? If so, what is the total tonnage?

On Aug. 3, 1914, The London Times said that on July 30 there were only a couple of dozen steamers of any importance discharging cargoes at the principal German ports, sixteen of which were in Hamburg.

Relating to Germany.

JOHN DE WITT.—I have seen a reference to the opinion expressed by Admiral Mahan just before England's entrance into the war to the effect that England must either fight Germany now along with France and Russia or later alone. Can you quote the exact words and tell me to whom they were uttered and where published?

Admiral Mahan's statement was in the form of an interview, and was published in The Times on Aug. 4, Page 7. He said in part: "Great Britain, as the third member of the Entente, finds herself in the position of Russia in 1805, when she permitted Napoleon to strike down Austria unaided and was herself struck down the following year at Jena. Or of that of France in 1866, when she stood by while Prussia crushed Austria and was herself overwhelmed in 1870." He expressed the opinion that England "must at once throw her preponderating fleet against Germany to maintain her position as a world power." "To remain out of the war meant for her "to sacrifice her empire in the next generation to the interest of this generation. * * * If Germany succeeds in downing both France and Russia she gains a respite by land which may enable her to build up a sea force equal or superior to that of Great Britain. In that case the world will be confronted with the naval power of a State, not like Great Britain, rated with land, but one eager and ambitious for expansion, eager also for influence. This consideration may well affect American sympathies."

Russian Prisoners.

JOSEPH CONTE.—Please give me information as to the number of Russian soldiers captured by the Teutonic armies in August.

On Sept. 2 a dispatch dated Berlin estimated the number of Russians captured since May 2 at 1,000,000, and the killed and wounded at 300,000. On Aug. 20 the Frankfurter Zeitung estimated the total capture of Russians by the Austro-German forces at 1,654,000.

Arms Shipments.

STEPHEN McINTYRE.—Where can I get some literature which maintains the position that parties are justified in shipping arms and munitions to the Allies?

See Mr. Lansing's answer to the Austrian protest published Aug. 16, Page 1, in The Times. See also the correspondence between the German Ambassador and Secretary Bryan on the subject of the American shipment of arms on Page 448 of The Times Current History of the War, Volume II, No. 3, for June, 1915. The articles of the Second Hague Conference of 1907 referring to "Rights and Duties of Neutrals," particularly article 7, will give you the international agreement on this subject at this time. President Pierce's message to the Thirty-fourth Congress discusses the same subject, and any work on international law in chapters dealing with the rights of neutrals may be consulted.

Origin of the Prussians.

G. HARKINS.—Will you please publish something of the origin of the Prussian race?

The exact origin of the Prussians is a subject of controversy. In the earliest times of which we have traditions the lower part of the basin of the Vistula was inhabited by non-Teutonic, probably Indo-Aryan, peoples, among them the Galindi, who were probably Prussian, and the Aistli, either Prussian or Esthonian. During the seventh and eighth centuries we hear of the Prussi and Lithuani, both of Indo-Aryan stock, in the lower Vistula as before. During the reign of Frederick II., who was crowned in 1215, what was then called Prussia was conquered for Christianity and civilization by the Knights of the Teutonic Order, who built up the State which was later associated with Brandenburg, so deeply to influence history. The work of civilization began in 1230. The Knights began by engaging in war against the heathen Prussi, and later the towns of Koenigsberg, Thorn, &c., were founded, and Courland and Livonia were conquered.

Marine Insurance Rate.

V. W. M.—Please give me the marine insurance rate on vessels carrying freight from New York to British ports; also the marine insurance rate on ordinary cargoes from New York to British ports now and before the war. To what extent have British Government loans been subscribed to in the United States? Estimate amount of British Government loans held by banks, companies, and private individuals in the United States.

There is no fixed rate for marine insurance on vessels as such, although a great many people seem to think that there is. It depends on the character of the vessel, but as a general proposition a rate of 1 per cent. to 1¼ per cent. would be about correct for transatlantic liners. The marine rates, both for vessels and cargo, have not been changed by the war, and cargo rates are about 15 cents for liners (passenger) and 25 to 30 cents for other cargo vessels. The war rates range from about ¾ per cent. to 1½ per cent. It is impossible to give an estimate in answer to your second question.

Zeppelins.

H. D. K.—Can you give me the sizes of the German Zeppelins and their probable cost? Any information about the dimensions of the dirigibles used by the Allies would also be appreciated.

The following figures are taken from lists of all the balloons except sphericals known to be in Germany's possession at the outbreak of war: Number of military balloons, 15; dimensions of largest, length, 512 feet; gas capacity, 780,000 cubic feet; total horse power, 540; smallest length, 243 feet; gas capacity, 233,000 cubic feet; useful load, 2,750 pounds; speed 27 miles per hour; total horse power, 150. We have no figures available as to the cost of these machines. At the outbreak of war France had 20 dirigible and semi-dirigible balloons; Great Britain, 15; Russia, 18; Italy, 15; Japan and Belgium, each, 4. We have no figures available of the dimensions of the French balloons, but the largest gas capacity listed is 16,000 cubic meters and the smallest 2,500 cubic meters. The largest Russian balloon listed has a gas capacity of 10,000 cubic meters and the smallest of 2,500 cubic meters.

Belgian Art and Literature.

MISS E. BEDELL.—Will you please tell me the names of the most prominent Belgian or Flemish poets, authors, painters, sculptors? Will you please give me a short biography of Albert, King of the Belgians?

The two most prominent names in modern Belgian literature are Maurice Maeterlinck, dramatist and essayist, (who is Belgian, although he writes in French,) and Emile Verhaeren, poet; in art, Constantin Meunier, the sculptor and painter, who died in 1905. Among names known in the various "genres" in present-day literature, are Elida Ram, Clo de Mont, Geyter, Cyril Buysse, Streuvels, Saabe, Wenstijns, Baelsemans, de Clercq, Rooses, de Potter. Prominent modern figures are Madame Courtmans, novelist; the sisters Rosalie and Virginia Loveling, poets; the poet Abbe Guido Gezelle, and the dramatist, Sleeckx.

King Albert of the Belgians is the only son of Philip, Count of Flanders, brother of Leopold II. He was born April 8, 1875, and was carefully educated. In 1900 he married the Duchess Elisabeth, daughter of Karl Theodor, Duke of Bavaria. He visited the United States and studied our industries and institutions. He became King on Dec. 23, 1909. His children are Leopold, born Nov. 1, 1901; Charles, born Oct. 10, 1903, and Marie-Jose, born Aug. 4, 1906.

The Bryce Report on Belgium.

W. G. F.—Will you have the kindness to advise a Western subscriber where he may obtain or see a copy of Lord Bryce's report on Belgian conditions and atrocities?

The report of the Viscount Bryce Committee on alleged German atrocities in Belgium was published in The New York Times Current History for June. This also answers the question of George Truscott.

Bulgarian Frontier.

JOHN ARN.—Has Austria-Hungary a frontier on Bulgaria since the last Balkan war?

Bulgaria has no frontier on Austria. According to the latest maps, published March, 1914, Bulgaria is bounded by Rumania and a small strip of Serbia on the north; on the south by a small portion of Greece, the Aegean Sea, and the portion of Turkey containing Adrianople; on the east by the Black Sea and the same portion of Turkey; on the west by Serbia.

German Cable.

GEORGE J. MERCER.—The British cut the cable from Emden, Germany, at the Azores Islands on Aug. 6, 1914.

"The Pentecost of Calamity."

E. W. EVANS.—Will you kindly favor me with a brief analysis of the word "Pentecost"? In its use as a part of the title of Mr. Owen Wister's new book, "The Pentecost of Calamity."

The feast of Pentecost being the time at which the Disciples received the gift of the Holy Ghost, in its descent upon them as tongues of fire, the word Pentecost has come to be used with the connotation of a gift from Heaven, making for richer and broader life. Mr. Wister's "Pentecost of Calamity" is understood, therefore, as the gift of enrichment, broadening, and inspiration coming from the calamity and catastrophe that has fallen upon Europe.

Declarations of War.

CONTROVERSY.—A claims that Russia declared war on Austria before Germany declared war on Russia. What are the facts? Did the German Socialists in the Reichstag support the declarations of war in 1914?

Russia never declared war on either Austria-Hungary or Germany; both countries declared war on Russia. With the delivery of the Austrian ultimatum to Serbia, Russia warned Austria-Hungary that she would defend the smaller Slav nation, and would mobilize her troops the day that Austrian soldiers crossed the Serbian frontier. July 28 Austria declared war on Serbia and the next day the Russian mobilization began. Germany declared war on Russia Aug. 1; Austria-Hungary declared war Aug. 6.

The Socialists in the Reichstag supported their country at the outbreak of war and voted in favor of the war loans.

A Blockade.

CONTROVERSY.—If the Allies should succeed in blockading the Baltic Sea, would their blockades in toto constitute a legal blockade? Would we have any grounds for protest?

This question is best answered by the following quotations from the convention regarding blockades, in the Declaration of London, signed Feb. 6, 1909:

"A blockade must not extend beyond the ports and coasts belonging to or occupied by the enemy.

"A blockade must be applied impartially to the ships of all nations.

"The blockading force must not bar access to neutral ports or coasts.

"Whatever may be the ultimate destination of a vessel or her cargo, she cannot be captured for breach of blockade if at the moment she is on her way to a non-blockaded port.

"A blockade, in order to be binding, must be effective."

Commanders' Ages.

F. N. D.—Will you please tell me what are the ages of some of the commanders of the European armies, or where I can get such information? I am especially anxious to find out if any are between the ages of 65 and 75 years.

Following are the ages of some of the most prominent commanders and leaders in the war: Sir John French, 63; General Joffre, 63; Admiral Jellicoe, 56; Lord Kitchener, 65; Admiral Hugo von Pohl, 60; General Radumil Putonik of Serbia, 66; Baron von der Goltz, 71; Kronprinz Wilhelm of Germany, 33; King Albert of the Belgians, 40; General Sir Horace Smith-Dorrien was born in 1858; Lieut. Gen. Sir Douglas Haig, in 1861; General Karl von Bülow, 1846; Kronprinz Rupprecht of Bavaria, 1869; General von Kluck, 1846; Grand Duke Nicholas Nicholaevitch, 1856; Admiral Frederick Sturdee, 1859; Admiral von Tirpitz, 1849; Prince Louis Alexander of Battenberg, 1854; General von Bissing, 1844; General Sir Ian Hamilton, 1853; General von Mackensen, 1849; General von Moltke, 1848. General Paul Pau is another leader who was retired, at the age of 67, but who re-entered the service of his country at the outbreak of war.

Saloniki.

A CONSTANT READER.—When did Saloniki become a part of Greece? According to the Encyclopaedia Britannica Saloniki is a part of the Turkish Empire. A reliable library atlas also has Saloniki on its maps as belonging to Turkey.

Saloniki was definitely lost to Turkey by the treaty of London, May 30, 1913, which ended the first Balkan war. After the fighting among the Balkan Allies over the division of their "spoils," Saloniki was ceded to Greece by the Treaty of Bucharest, Aug. 6, 1913. Saloniki surrendered to the Greek forces on Nov. 8, 1912, and by the treaty of London Turkey lost all her European possessions except Constantinople and a small tract of adjacent land east of the Maritza River.

London.

P. S.—Is London a fortified city in the full meaning of the word?

No.

The Ruler of Bulgaria.

H. E.—Will you kindly tell me whether the ruler of Bulgaria is Czar or King?

Ferdinand of Bulgaria is "Czar" of his country.

Attacking Aircraft.

READER.—Will you kindly tell me what precautions are taken to protect friends from the returning missiles of anti-aircraft guns?

The only precautions that can be taken to protect friends from the returning missiles of guns attacking aircraft are to warn them to keep out of the way, and not to fire where there is as much danger to friends as to enemies. A missile that hits an aircraft is usually imbedded in it.

Bulgaria.

W. R. T.—Will you kindly tell me the date of Bulgaria's entry into the war?

Bulgaria having failed to reply favorably to the Russian ultimatum, the allied envoys at Sofia asked for their passports on Oct. 5. The dropping of bombs from an aeroplane on Nish, Oct. 8, was described as "Bulgaria's first act of war."

Serbia.

M. L. B.—Will you kindly tell me Serbia's real part in beginning or being an excuse for the war?

The heir to the Austrian throne, Archduke Francis Ferdinand, was assassinated by a Serb June 28, 1914. Thereupon Austria-Hungary prepared an ultimatum to Serbia, consisting of eleven articles. Of these articles eight were accepted by Serbia, one was accepted subject to proof, one was accepted conditionally, and one was conditionally rejected. Austria-Hungary declared this reply to be unsatisfactory. Meanwhile, Russia declared herself to be the protector of the smaller Slav nation, and warned Austria-Hungary that she would mobilize the day Austrian troops crossed the Serbian frontier. Germany, while expressing a wish that the trouble be localized, was the other powers of Europe that she was the ally of Austria. An invitation from Sir Edward Grey for a meeting to discuss amicable settlements of the trouble was rejected by both Austria-Hungary and Germany. Austria-Hungary declared war upon Serbia July 28, 1914. Russia immediately began a partial mobilization. Germany demanded that the Russian mobilization cease, and Russia made no satisfactory reply. Germany declared war upon Russia the first day of August.

The Wants of New York People Are Many

But diversified as they are, Greenhut's can and DOES supply them all—nearly.

For there's hardly a human need that cannot be well, economically and satisfactorily filled here. Years ago this great retail store was founded with a fixed purpose in view—that of supplying "BETTER GOODS FOR THE SAME MONEY OR THE SAME GOODS FOR LESS MONEY THAN ELSEWHERE."

And in the years to come this is the policy to which we shall faithfully adhere.

The old English merchants used to greet their costumers with the question: "What d'ye lack?" In a larger way we address the great public of New York:

What you lack is HERE, priced as only Greenhut's can price it.

DOUBLING UP APARTMENTS.

Two Families Where One is Allowed Violates Department Law.

Inspections being made by the Tenement House Department, says Commissioner John J. Murphy, indicate that in certain sections owners of apartment and tenement houses are subdividing suites of apartments without notice to the Tenement House Department, and thus violating the law.

The Tenement House Department, in issuing a notice on this subject, states that evidently many owners violate the law thoughtlessly. Whenever the department finds that such conditions have been created it has no option but to require the summary vacation of the family occupying the part of the apartment which has no access to the fire escape, and it is obliged to commence proceedings for the collection of a penalty from the delinquent owner.

As the result of a census completed by the department a number of houses have been discovered which, though not erected as or altered into tenement houses, are being used for tenement purposes.

NEW EAST RIVER TUNNELS.

Consents of Property Owners Secured by Commission.

Consents from interested property owners for the legalization of Rapid Transit Route No. 61, which takes in the compromise tunnel agreed on between the Degnon Contracting Company and the Public Service Commission, whereby tunnels are to be built from East Sixtieth Street, Manhattan, under the East River to Long Island City, instead of rebuilding the Manhattan approach to the Queensboro Bridge, have been secured according to a communication sent by Secretary Travis Whitney of the Public Service Commission to the different civic associations in Queens.

Consents from the property owners were necessary for this change in plans, and while property owners in Long Island City were anxious to sign, it was anticipated that some opposition might develop on the Manhattan side of the river.

The Public Service Commission is now taking the necessary steps to legalize the new route and engineers are preparing specifications and soundings, and borings will soon be started as a preliminary to awarding the contract for the building of the tunnel.

Apartments Leased.

Apartments have been leased by Pease & Elliman at 161 East Seventy-ninth Street to Miss Doris Andrews, 525 Park Avenue to Killian Van Rensselaer, 105 Gramercy Park to Arthur J. Morris and Huger W. THREE BLOCK FRONTS OF TALL APARTMENTS GOING UP ON PARK AVENUE TO MEET DEMAND

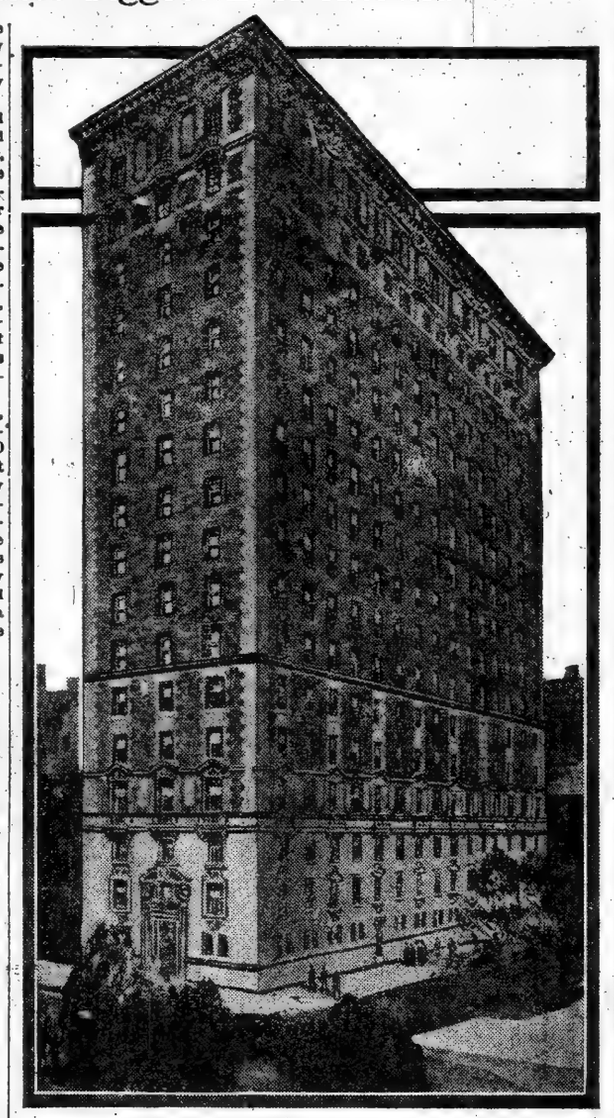
One Will Be Seventeen Stories High and Cost Over $1,000,000—All These Operations Below Fifty-ninth Street—This Year's Rental Season for Expensive Suites Biggest Ever Known.

NEVER in the history of Park Avenue's remarkable transformation within recent years from a thoroughfare of small flats to the greatest avenue of magnificent multi-family houses in the world has the rental season in its vicinity been so successful as this year. When one considers that of the six tall structures opened this Fall on the avenue, four were fully rented before completion, while the other two, one at 995, near Eighty-second Street, and the other at 1,155, corner of Ninety-second Street, have few vacancies, some idea is gained of the continued demand for high-priced suites in that choice residential centre.

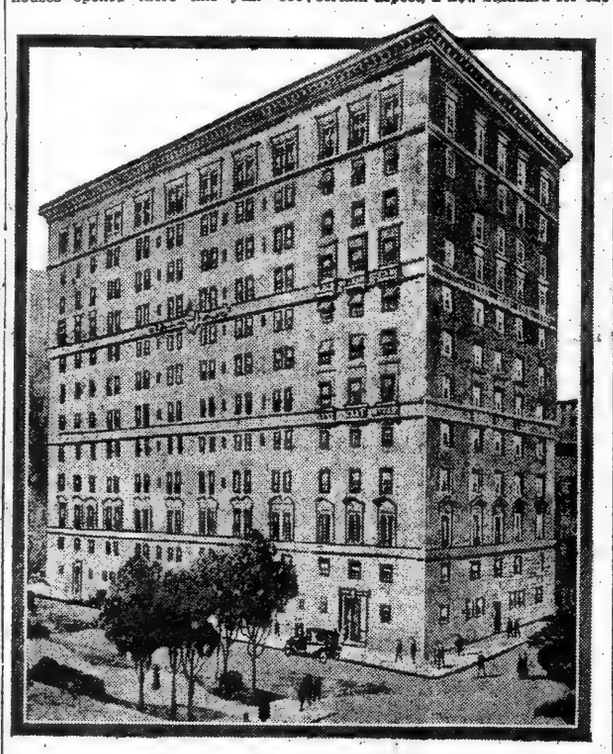
"I will admit that I am surprised at the instant success of so many of these big apartments," said Douglas L. Elliman last week. "I have always been partial to Park Avenue, believing firmly in its future, but its growth has been faster and more substantial than I had dared to anticipate. It is a curious fact, also, that the more expensive apartments rent first. The best prices are obtained in the blocks from about Fiftieth to Sixty-sixth Street. The biggest developments now seem to be centred in the blocks below Fifty-ninth Street, and of the two large houses opened there this year—399 and 400 Park Avenue, the southeast and northwest corners of Fifty-fourth Street, respectively—both were completely rented before Sept. 1. There has been no difficulty in getting tenants for Park Avenue this year, and it may also be interesting to note that a new record for prices on the side streets has been established in the rental of suites for $4,500 in the new house on the north side of Sixty-second Street, adjoining the new Colony Club."

As an indication that builders and operators believe that the demand will continue to keep pace with the supply, it is worth noting that three entire block fronts are now in process of improvement with tall apartments for occupancy next season. Each of these block fronts will contain two separate buildings. In addition, plans were just filed for a tall house on the southwest corner of Fifty-eighth Street, and twelve-story houses are also projected for the southwest corners of Sixty-third and Eighty-first Streets and the northwest corner of Eighty-fourth Street.

The three block front improvements, which will mean an expenditure within twelve months of over $4,500,000 in buildings alone, are on the west side of the avenue, being respectively between Fiftieth and Fifty-first, Fifty-first and Fifty-second, and Fifty-fifth and Fifty-sixth Streets. The buildings on the two former blocks will be of the twelve or thirteen story type. That between Fifty-fifth and Fifty-sixth Streets will create, in a certain aspect, a new standard for the avenue, as it will have a height of seventeen stories, or, with the pent house, eighteen stories. In this respect it will be equal to the seventeen-story house on the northeast corner of Seventy-ninth Street erected a few years ago by Bing & Bing and purchased by the late Mrs. Morris K. Jesup, but it will exceed that one in ground area.



Seventeen-Story Apartment for Westerly Block Front Between Fifty-fifth and Fifty-sixth Streets. Warren & Wetmore, Architects.



Twelve-Story Apartment on Westerly Block Front Between Fiftieth and Fifty-first Streets. Warren & Wetmore, Architects.

The building is being erected by the Fullerton Weaver Company from plans by the architects, Warren & Wetmore, and they are also the architects of the twelve-story row on the Fiftieth to Fifty-first Street block. The eighteen-story operation will be known as 410 and 420 Park Avenue. There will be one suite on a floor of the two separately contained apartments, containing eighteen rooms, and rentals will run from $8,000 to $11,000, the upper floors commanding the higher prices. Douglas S. Elliman & Co., the agents, state that four apartments in this mammoth building have already been rented.

On account of the shape of the building, which is long and narrow, facing sixty-six feet eight inches on each street, every room will have an outside frontage. The architects have made a feature of the kitchens, which are planned like miniature hotel kitchens. The cost of the building will exceed $1,000,000.

In the twelve-story row on the Fiftieth to Fifty-first Street block, of which Pease & Elliman are agents, there will be three types of apartments, one on the corner of Fiftieth Street of sixteen rooms, at a rental of from $7,400 to $9,000. In the centre, facing on Park Avenue, will be duplex apartments of fourteen rooms, at a rental of $6,200 to $7,200. On the corner of Fifty-first Street will be apartments of thirteen and fourteen rooms, at rentals of $5,600 to $7,000.

There will be four entrances—two on Park Avenue and one on each street. On the entrance floor will be four doctors' apartments of two rooms.

NEW REALTY BOARD ON STATEN ISLAND

A new association of real estate men known as the Real Estate Board of Staten Island was permanently organized at a meeting held at St. George, S. I., last week.

The organization was brought about as a result of the energetic work of Anning S. Prall, who attended the recent convention of the Real Estate Association of the State of New York at Saratoga. Mr. Prall there learned of the importance to the locality of a local board and upon his return enlisted the co-operation of real estate owners, operators, and brokers throughout Staten Island.

More than 100 gathered at the meeting at St. George, and the permanent organization was effected by the adopting of a constitution and by-laws, submitted by an organization committee and the election of the following officers and Board of Governors: Anning S. Prall, President; Charles E. Griffith, Jr., Vice President; William L. Flake, Treasurer; Gustav A. Barth, Secretary; members of Board of Governors, Henry F. Contois, Anton L. Schwab, Frank Foggin, Cornelius G. Koiff, and P. G. Ullman, Jr.

After the business meeting the new board held its first annual banquet at Hugot's Hotel.

Cornelius G. Koiff acted as toastmaster, and after a greeting by the newly elected President, Mr. Anning S. Prall, Borough President Calvin D. Van Name made an ardent plea for a united effort to secure better transportation facilities to and within Staten Island.

Brief addresses were also made by L. D. Woodworth, President Real Estate Association of the State of New York, on "Realty Interests in Their Broader Aspects"; M. Morgenthau, Jr., Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Real Estate Association of the State of New York, on "Accomplishments—A Retrospective and a Prophecy"; A. R. Wagg, Second Vice President Real Estate Association of the State of New York, on "State Regulation of the Real Estate Business"; the Hon. J. Harry Tierman, County Judge, on "Laws Affecting Real Estate"; Stephen D. Stephens, Member of Assembly, on "The Legislature and Real Estate," and Henry P. Morrison, Commissioner of Public Works, on "The Best Real Estate on the Best Spot on Earth."

The new Real Estate Board has already indicated that it will be one of the organizations affiliated with the Real Estate Association of the State of New York, and its members are taking an active interest in the work of the State organization.

CROSSTOWN LINE EXTENSION

East Side Arrayed Against West Side in Car Line Fight.

There is every prospect of a lively meeting before the Board of Estimate on Friday next when the application of the New York City Railways Company to extend its crosstown line through Eighty-sixth Street will be given a preliminary hearing.

Residents and property owners on West Eighty-sixth Street have organized and appointed a committee to fight the proposition on the ground that the extension of the line to Broadway as proposed would ruin the present character of the street and cause a great property loss.

East siders, through the medium of the Yorkville Association, complain that when they ride westward in Eighty-sixth Street they are dumped out at the Park entrance and if they want to go as far westward as Columbus Avenue or Amsterdam Avenue they must walk.

A member of the West Eighty-sixth Street Committee which is composed of Horace A. Saks, Chairman, A. P. Gardiner, B. J. Homan, George E. Ruppert, and Hyman Sonn, discussing the matter yesterday, said

"This street was laid out as a park street, and was formerly under the jurisdiction of the Park Department. The Park Department still has the care of the beautiful trees that line both sides of the street. When Mr. Stover was Park Commissioner and Mr. McAneny Borough President the city Government transferred the jurisdiction of this street from the Park Department to the President of the Borough of Manhattan in order that it might be properly paved.

"This was done without the knowledge or consent of the residents of the street and is now looked upon as a trick of the railroad company to make it easier for them to put through their oft-attempted plan to extend their crosstown line to Broadway.

"One of the earlier attempts of the City of New York to carry out a consistent and far-seeing project of city planning was to lay out Seventy-second Street, Eighty-sixth Street, Ninety-sixth Street, 110th Street, and West End Avenue as park streets. This amounted to an invitation to the property owners on these streets to develop their property in a way that would be in harmony with this plan of the city.

"The property owners on Eighty-sixth Street, to a greater extent than on any of the other streets, accepted this invitation in good faith, and the street on both sides, for almost the entire distance between Central Park and Riverside Drive, has been improved with handsome private residences and a few high-class apartment houses.

"These houses are suitable improvements for a broad street, with trees, and a street that is not given over to street railroads. To undertake to reverse this policy at this time, after the property owners have spent their money in erecting buildings which are suitable only for a quiet park street, would furnish an example of inefficient management that is not to be expected of this administration.

"The question is not whether this ought to have been laid out originally as a park street. That was decided years ago. It would be ridiculous to stand for a policy of far-sighted city planning, and at the same time lightly upset the plans of previous administrations. After a distinct plan has been adopted by the city, and property owners have improved their property in accordance therewith, it involves a large loss to these property owners when the plan is abandoned. It is safe to say that every building on this street would be depreciated in value 25 per cent. if this street car line were allowed to run through the street.

"The cause of the residents on Eighty-sixth Street ought to arouse the interest of the dwellers on every park street. Fifth Avenue has succeeded in keeping a car line off the street, with the consequence that property owners on that street have increased enormously and given New York one of the finest high-class business and residence avenues in the world. Does anybody believe that this would have been the case if there had been a car line through the street? To a lesser extent park streets, like West End Avenue and Eighty-sixth Street, may be expected to keep their character as residence streets if car lines are kept off of them.

"There are few enough places in New York relieved of the incessant din of a car line. The way people are flocking to Park Avenue, north of Fiftieth Street, and the high values which lots on this avenue have attained since the completion of the Grand Central terminal, show how highly New Yorkers value a street which is likely to remain free from the burden of a car line.

"The city Administration ought to realize that the development of new transportation lines in New York City is being very much overdone, and that the principal reason for the depression in the real estate market is the impossibility of foreseeing the consequences of the many new transit lines that are now being completed.

"Every time a transit line is put through a street, it is likely to require the rebuilding of that street. On account of the changed condition, the old improvements become inappropriate. If a car line is run through Eighty-sixth Street, it will require ultimately the rebuilding of that street, to the great loss of the property owners."

BUILDING CONTRASTS ON MURRAY HILL

Havemeyer Mansion Being Torn Down for Loft Site and Dodge Residence Being Rebuilt.

ONLY A BLOCK APART

Property Owners Fight to Stop the Erection of 16-Story Structure on Havemeyer Site.

An interesting contrast in the changing conditions of the old residential centre of Murray Hill may be seen on two prominent corners on Madison Avenue within a single block. One is at the southwest corner of Thirty-eighth Street, where the magnificent Havemeyer mansion is being torn down for a sixteen-story building, while on the southwest corner of Thirty-ninth Street the old home of the late Miss Grace H. Dodge is undergoing alterations to fit it for a more convenient and attractive home.

The latter work is doubly interesting in that it represents the greatest expenditure on a private house that has been made in that section of Murray Hill for several years. To make this comparison more striking, the twelve-story business improvement just one block north, on the southwest corner of Fortieth Street, might be cited, a site formerly covered by two fine dwellings, but which gave way to the steadily increasing demands of trade during the Summer.

The Dodge house, which was purchased by George F. Baker last Spring, shortly after the death of Miss Dodge, was transferred a little later to Mrs. William Goadby Loew, daughter of Mr. Baker, and it has been extensively altered, both inside and outside, from plans by the architects, Walker & Gillette. The most radical outward change is its transformation from the old-fashioned high-stoop type to the American basement style, the entrance on Madison Avenue being flanked by two dignified Ionic brownstone columns. The Goadby Loews have occupied the adjoining house, at 200 Madison Avenue, somewhat smaller than the former Dodge residence, a wide house with the advantage of a corner frontage.

Adjoining the former Loew house is the large residence of Mr. Baker. He also owns the adjoining low professional building on the Thirty-eighth Street corner, and by his purchase of the Dodge property he controls the entire block front. Mr. Baker has made a hard fight for years to preserve the residential character of Murray Hill, and although his holdings are just outside of the closely restricted zone, his block front ownership will have the effect of presenting a barrier to the encroachment of trade on the avenue below Thirty-ninth Street.

The only exception, unless the houses on the easterly block opposite Mr. Baker's holdings succumb to trade, is the former Havemeyer corner, purchased last May by August Hecksher. His announcement of a sixteen-story building for the corner came as a shock to the Murray Hill residential set, and Mr. Hecksher has been made defendant in a suit to determine his right to erect such a structure on the northern boundary of the restricted zone. Search of the Havemeyer title revealed the hitherto forgotten fact that the property was sold by the Murray heirs in 1843, four years before the existence of the restrictive clause.

The Title Insurance and Trust Company accepted the record of this early sale as a good one and insured Mr. Hecksher's title free from all limitations to business. The basis of the suit will doubtless hinge upon the intent of the Murray heirs to include the corner in the restricted section, and as the decision will exert a marked effect upon the future of Murray Hill, the opinion of the court will be awaited with considerable interest.

NEW RAILROAD LINE.

Second Section of New York Connecting Railroad Being Built.

Operations have been started on the second section of the New York Connecting Railroad—the $30,000,000 project which will unite Long Island with the mainland and establish uninterrupted railroad traffic for both freight and passengers. The erection of the steel work of the huge bridge across Hell Gate has advanced rapidly.

The second section extends through Newtown, where the route is gradually depressed, and partly tunnel construction, until the Lutheran Cemetery is reached, where it will enter a tunnel more than half a mile in length and be carried over the tracks of the Long Island Railroad to the Evergreen section, where again it will pass through tunnels under East New York and connect through Brooklyn with the Bay Ridge terminal.

This new section will consist of concrete viaducts thirty to fifty feet in height, and the principal streets to be crossed are Jackson Avenue, Roosevelt Avenue, Shell Road, Queens Boulevard, Grand Street, and Metropolitan Avenue, at Lutheran Cemetery. The tunnel form of construction will be used where this branch crosses the North Shore Division and the main line of the Long Island Railroad in the Newtown section.

ADVOCATES THE NEW CONSTITUTION

Advisory Council of Real Estate Interests Working for Its Adoption.

SOME SECTIONS ANALYZED

Important Amendments That Affect the Taxpayer and Result in an Equalization of Taxation.

After several weeks of deliberation, during which each and every section of the proposed Constitution to be voted on next Tuesday was carefully analyzed, the Advisory Council of Real Estate Interests of New York issued a circular letter yesterday to taxpayers in which it strongly advised them to support the measure and exert their best efforts to securing its adoption. At the outset the letter reminds the taxpayers that "in view of the fact that State expenses will be increased, the defeat of the financial and administrative reforms contained in the constitutional amendments would well nigh approach a calamity in so far as taxpayers are individually concerned. A serious responsibility has thus devolved on property owners to actively work in their behalf.

"Twenty years ago there was no State debt; today the State debt amounts to $186,000,000, with an authorized debt of $231,000,000. The county and municipal debts of this State are the highest in any State in the Union, and, if spread over the acreage of New York, would amount to $48 per acre.

"The general expenses of running the State have increased nearly 60 per cent. in thirty years, while the population has increased only 32 per cent. By the budget provisions of the new Constitution it will be possible to bring about a reduction in our annual State expenditures.

"The entire form of budget procedure has been revised so that the Governor submits to the Legislature his budget, instead of the Legislature preparing the usual "pork barrel" appropriation bill. In this connection, the Constitution consolidates 152 separate departments, boards, and bureaus of the State into seventeen. Here has been devised a salutary process for abolishing hundreds of unnecessary positions.

"By discontinuing the payment of salaries to a horde of superfluous public servants, the present extravagant cost of government would be greatly reduced. In order that the financial policy of the State may be established on a sound basis, issues of serial bonds have been provided to pay the public debt.

"By the use of serial bonds instead of sinking funds much interest could be saved to the State on its bond issues; for example, if the bond issue of $27,000,000 to complete the canal can be made in the form of serial bonds, the saving alone to the State will be $10,000,000, while if the present canal debt of $118,000,000 had been issued in this form, there would have been a saving in interest and principal of more than $46,000,000.

"The proposed Constitution also gives authority to refund the present sinking fund State bonds with serial bonds. If this authority is used, a saving of over $30,000,000 can be effected. It is further provided that the debts contracted for an improvement shall not run beyond the duration of the improvement; today there are some $65,000,000 worth of fifty-year bonds, issued for highways, about 30 per cent. of the proceeds of which has gone into the surface of highways, the life of which is less than five years.

"Thus $30,000,000 will go toward paying interest upon a debt forty-five years after all the benefit of the debt has been wiped out. It is also provided that the swollen sinking funds of the State, toward which taxpayers have contributed much more than is needed, will be done away with, and the moneys accumulating in these funds will be distributed with due regard for proper fiscal principles.

"No public moneys may hereafter be appropriated for any work until plans and estimates of the cost are first filed by the Superintendent of Public Works. This, in itself, will do away with a source of great abuse, for it is well known that the State's money has been wasted on bridges, buildings, and other local improvements which should have been paid for by up-State counties.

"One of the most perplexing difficulties confronting property owners has been to establish the responsibility of public servants for unwise administration of office. For the first time in the State's history, responsible government has been established by the short ballot, making the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Controller, and Attorney General the only elective officers. The popular practice among public officers of shifting the responsibility for certain actions to other officials is thus absolutely prevented, and taxpayers will acquire an advantage never before possessed.

"A large measure of home rule for cities of the State is also provided, so that each city shall have the right to organize and manage the departments of city government and regulate compensation and method of removal of all city officers and employes; thus enabling them to obtain what is just and fair both to themselves and taxpayers without the necessity of going to the Legislature.

"If this amendment were passed the greatest obstacle toward economy in the City of New York would be removed. It would be impossible to impose on the city all forms of mandatory legislation. At the same time this home rule provision would restrain the city from devising any new sources of taxation without first consulting the Legislature. In this respect property owners could not request a home rule provision more to their own interests.

"Probably the most important amendment is that relating to taxation, providing that the power of taxation can never be surrendered by the State and calling a halt to the increasing exemptions from taxation by requiring a two-thirds vote of each house of the Legislature before any property can be exempted from taxation. This article confers on the Legislature power to reorganize the method and machinery of assessment so as to modernize taxation throughout the State. The greatest benefit that can accrue from this article is the equalization of taxes throughout the State, preventing a 100 per cent. assessment in New York City and a 15 per cent. assessment up State.

"The council also favors affirmative action upon the question of a bond issue of $27,000,000 for the completion of the Barge Canal. If this particular issue should be determined upon affirmatively this entire amount will be included in the annual expenses of the State, thus making the direct State tax for next year very large indeed."

Bronx Board Favors Canal Bonds.

The Bronx Board of Trade has gone on record in favor of the issuance of the $27,000,000 bond issue to finish the State Barge Canal. The completion of the work is of vital importance to residents of the Bronx, as the Harlem River improvements, made possible by appropriations secured through the efforts of the Bronx Board of Trade, will be completed by the time the Barge Canal is finished, providing the bond issue is approved.

Motion Picture Studio Site.

I have been instructed by a Western Syndicate needing cash to dispose of 32 acres situated at Grantwood, on the western slope of the Palisades, overlooking the Hackensack Valley, with view of the Orange Mountains and surrounding country extending for miles. This property has 600 feet frontage on Bergen Boulevard, and 80 foot street, running along top of the western edge of the Palisades, a depth of 800 feet and a rear line of 800 feet. It will be sold in its entirety or cut up in tracts of approximately 200 feet frontage on Bergen Boulevard, extending through to the rear line. The property is absolutely unrestricted, with water and electricity at hand, and sewer and gas 200 feet distant. The trolley lines connect the property with the 130th St. and 42d St. ferries. This property can be developed for moderate priced dwellings, of which there is a shortage at present in this section, or it would be an ideal site for Motion Picture Studio and manufacturing plant. As it must be sold no reasonable offer will be refused and suitable terms made with responsible parties. No exchange proposition considered. All brokers protected.

MILITARY MEN URGE GUAM AS NAVAL BASE

Island Could Be Made a Second Gibraltar, Declare Advocates of Preparedness.

COULD BE EASILY HELD

And Serve as First Defense Line Against Attack from Asiatic Power — Pearl Harbor Inadequate.

In the opinion of many of the officers who have studied the matter of military preparedness for this country, a most vital part of any such plan is the establishment of a strong naval base in the Pacific. Military experts agree that the United States has the ideal spot for such a base in the island of Guam, which was taken from Spain in 1898. With 6,000 soldiers, including infantry and several batteries of field artillery, a half-dozen 14-inch rifles, the same number of mortar pits with twenty-four 12-inch guns, it is said the island would be another Gibraltar, far more formidable to an attacking foe than was Kiao-Chau.

"If Guam were well fortified, it could be held indefinitely," declared an officer who is an authority on coast defense. "And with Guam in our possession," he added, "the idea of any Asiatic power capturing Honolulu or bombarding the American coast might be dismissed."

According to this officer, the United States Asiatic Squadron could be concentrated in the harbor of San Luis D'Apra, the island's bay, which faces the Philippines, China, and Japan, and no nation from the Orient would dare leave it unwatched while attacking the United States.

"You know the great question with us in the army in regard to our Far Eastern policy," he said, "is whether or not we can defend the Philippines, and, falling there, where our first line of defense should be established against any strong Asiatic people with whom we might become involved. Preparations are now under way which make it certain that in time of trouble we will be able to give an account of ourselves around Manila, but the fate of Kiao-Chau shows clearly what must happen to even the stoutest military power if it occupies a position far away from home that can be assaulted by overwhelming land forces.

"It is true that Pearl Harbor in the Hawaiian Islands has been strengthened with formidable fortifications, so that it is expected that the troops there would be able to hold out until aid reached them from this country. Also Pearl Harbor, lying as it does midway between Alaska and Samoa, dominates what may be termed the friendly waters of the Pacific.

Pearl Harbor Inadequate.

"But many of us who have gone over the matter, and who realize how much coast defense must depend on the navy, feel that Pearl Harbor, being on a large island where a landing force may overwhelm the garrison by superior numbers, is not quite strong enough to be relied on absolutely as a line of defense. And so we turn to the island of Guam, which is practically the same distance from the Philippines as it is from Japan, and is so situated that it would threaten the communications of any force attacking our Pacific Coast or the Hawaiian Islands. Also nature has made this island practically impregnable if any serious attempt is made to defend it.

"Guam is only some ten miles wide and about twenty-nine long. Surrounded as it is by coral reefs, ships and boats can only approach it in a few places where streams of fresh water have cut channels as they flowed out to sea. Besides San Luis D'Apra there are only three or four ports, none of which can accommodate anything like a fleet.

"San Luis is protected by coral reefs, which make the entrance to the harbor exceedingly difficult even to the pilot familiar with those waters. Back of it is elevated land reaching above 600 feet in height, on which could be placed the big rifles and mortars that would control not only San Luis, but also the approaches from the other side. Mortars in one or two other places where large ships might come up would effectively back up the coral reefs in preventing their near approach.

"For the landing parties in small boats field pieces could be used. Communications could be established over the island by means of roads, several of which are already built. Six thousand men would be ample for every purpose, and in time of war it would be possible for them to procure all the food and water necessary right on the island.

Guam Dominates Trade Route.

"But, aside from the fact that it can be rendered practically impregnable, Guam excels as a naval base because of its advantageous position, dominating the trade route between Hawaii and Asia, and also because warships in its harbor could only be blockaded with the greatest difficulty. There is practically no anchorage off San Luis, and a blockading squadron would have to sail up and down outside under its own steam. There are no near-by havens of refuge for ships.

"The best way to realize the value of Guam is to imagine what the Emden would have done had she a fortified harbor whither she could run when hard pressed. San Luis is only three days' sail from either the Philippines or Japan, and it must be put completely out of commission before a nation from Asia dare attack our mainland.

"The present naval base in the Philippine Islands at Olongapo in Subig Bay, just north of Manila, may be easily blockaded, also, like Kiao-Chau. It may be stormed from the land, and if we had to fight a powerful Oriental nation our ships there would stand an excellent chance of being captured by the hostile army."

It is admitted by even the most ardent adherents of the plan for making Guam the naval base instead of Olongapo that the scheme would require a large outlay of money with the possibility that no occasion might ever arise that would justify it. But in discussing the matter one of the officers spoke of a remark made recently at the Rotary Club luncheon in New York, in which the principal speaker asserted in reference to our occupation of the Philippines that we should either get in or get out of the islands.

"That's exactly the way most of us feel," declared the officer. "We should either get ready to run when war is declared, or we should take measures that would insure the necessary sacrifice of men and ships bringing adequate returns in the shape of greater safety to the people at home."

SHIFT FLEET'S COMMANDERS

Many Changes Announced — Rear Admiral to Torpedo Flotilla.

Many changes in the commanding personnel of the Atlantic Fleet are taking place, the latest being the assignment of Rear Admiral Albert Gleaves to command the Torpedo Flotilla, in succession to Captain William S. Sims, who has been ordered to take command of the new superdreadnought Nevada, shortly to be commissioned and assigned to the First Division of the fleet. Admiral Gleaves, who until his promotion, a few weeks ago, commanded the dreadnought Utah, is the first officer of flag rank to command the destroyer groups of the fleet.

Rear Admiral Walter McLean, now commanding the Fourth Division of the fleet, has been ordered relieved by Rear Admiral H. O. Dunn. Admiral McLean will go to Norfolk as Rear Admiral Frank E. Beatty's successor as Commandant of the navy yard at that port.

Other changes recent and to come involve the commands of the superdreadnoughts New York, Wyoming, and Utah, the dreadnoughts South Carolina and Michigan, and the battleship Georgia. Captain Hugh Rodman is the new commander of the New York, Captain Thomas Snowden of the fleet flagship Wyoming, Captain A. S. Halstead of the Utah, and Captain Samuel S. Robison of the South Carolina. Captain Niblack's successor as commander of the Michigan will be announced in a few days.

A complete change in the commanding personnel of the coast fortifications near New York has also been made. Lieut. Col. Delamere Skerrett succeeds Colonel Thomas Ridgway in command of Fort Hancock, Colonel Samuel E. Allen takes command of Fort Wadsworth, and Lieut. Col. William G. Haan succeeds Lieut. Col. C. C. Hearn as commander at Fort Totten. Fort Hamilton is the only New York fortification which does not get a new commander in the general sweep. Colonel Ridgway takes command of the Boston fortifications, and Colonel Hearn is ordered to the Philippines.

TO NAME HYDROAEROPLANE

Governor's Daughter to be Sponsor for Naval Militia's Machine.

The National Aeroplane Fund, founded by the Aero Club of America, will give the New York Naval Militia its first hydroaeoplane on Monday. The ceremonies will take place at the steamship Granite State, headquarters of the First Battalion, at Ninety-sixth Street and Riverside Drive.

Miss Olive Whitman, the little daughter of Governor and Mrs. Charles S. Whitman, will name the flying boat, the ceremonies starting at 2:30 in the afternoon. Commander Charles L. Poor of the First Battalion will be in charge, and Governor Whitman will deliver a short address before the boat is named. Ensign Lee H. Harris of the Naval Militia, a graduate of the Curtiss Flying School at Bufalo, will take the "N. Y. N. 1," as the hydroaeroplane will be numbered, out on the Hudson for a flight after the ceremonies.

Among those who have accepted invitations to attend are Mayor and Mrs. Mitchel, Major General Leonard Wood, Captain Mark L. Bristol, Director of Naval Aeronautics; Major General O'Ryan, Commodore Forshew of the Naval Militia, Admiral Usher, and Rear Admiral Peary. A number of sportsmen fliers have been invited to attend in their hydroaeroplanes. Among these are Vincent Astor, Harry Payne Whitney, Truman W. Post, Lawrence B. Sperry, and Robert G. Fowler of this city; Clarke Thomson and Robert Glendinning of Philadelphia, and T. C. Macaulay, B. H. Kendrick, E. J. Jasmith, J. B. B. Verplanck, David H. McCulloch, and John Lansing Callan. A float has been provided, to which they will moor their flying boats during the ceremonies.

ST. JOSEPH'S ALUMNAE MEET

Consider Plans for International Convention—Interest in Seal Competition.

The New York Chapter of the Alumnae Association of St. Joseph's College, Emmittsburg, Md., held its sixth meeting last Wednesday at the home of Mrs. Samuel Hassell at Great Neck, L. I., with the Past Regent, Mrs. James J. Sheeran, presiding.

Plans for representation at the coming convention in Chicago of the International Federation of Catholic Alumnae were considered.

Artist members of the chapter promised to submit designs in the competition for a seal of the international body.

Porch Sleepers.

Mrs. Tom E. Thompson discusses the sleeping porch grouch in The Howard Courant: Did you ever see a year-round porch sleeper who was well, happy, and contented, who was not thin, weak, sick, cross, or disgusted? One reason is that the porch crowd gets very little sleep. They do not particularly say they get very little sleep, but it is evident by the stories they tell. They not only hear the mocking bird mock but they hear everything else, from the doctor's auto and the long, lean, howling hound to the gnat walking on the back porch.—Topeka Capital.

All About the Hills.

A stranger in Columbia objects to the hills, and thus saith The Times: "Hills are relative, like everything else in the world. To the man from either Seattle or Kansas City, Columbia appears as flat as a prairie. To the dweller in a prairie city, no doubt the town seems hilly. Objection to hills is ill-founded. No romance or sentiment attaches to a plain. Plains never figured in poetry; they never will. But from time immemorial the hills have been the symbols of eternity."—Kansas City Times.

HATFIELD HOUSE,

CURRENT NEWS AND NOTES OF THE AUTOMOBILE WORLD

AUTO MANUFACTURERS BACK "SAFETY FIRST" IDEA

J. Walter Drake Tells Convention in Detroit That Makers Want to Co-operate to Prevent Accidents and Improve Driving.

Automobile manufacturers seem to have decided to take up the "Safety First" movement in connection with the Safety First Federation of America. J. Walter Drake, a Director in the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce, sounded the keynote of this movement in an address before the Safety First Convention in Detroit recently. Speaking as a representative of the national organization on the subject "Co-operation On Behalf of the Automobile Manufacturers," Mr. Drake said that the manufacturers were for anything and everything the Safety First organization might suggest which would be within reason. He stated that they were willing to equip the cars with safety devices that might help to solve the great problem of today and greatly reduce the loss of human life.

"The automobile problem has probably hastened the advent of the 'Safety First' movement," said Mr. Drake, "but I do not believe it is wholly responsible for it or the large number of accidents and fatalities. The main trouble is that the whole world is in too much of a hurry. We are for safety first, last, and always. All we ask is that we be allowed to co-operate with your organization. I believe the auto photographic license is a proper thing, for an auto in the hands of the wrong person is a most dangerous instrument."

His speech in part was as follows:

"I am glad to have the opportunity to tell you what I think is the attitude of the automobile manufacturer towards the 'safety first' propaganda. I won't say propaganda; I will say 'safety first' religion. In the first place let me assure you all that those of us who are busy making automobiles, whether you recognize it or not, we are at the same time just ordinary fellows of the same sort as the rest of the community, and when we go along the streets and try to shoot across Woodward Avenue we curse the fellow who came near running us down, just the same as the man who never rode in an automobile.

"The automobile is on trial apparently. The manufacturer is placed as a sponsor, and it seems to be around this that the question of 'safety first' somewhat revolves.

"Here is the attitude of the manufacturer—that the automobile is not here to enable a few people to drive at the rate of thirty or forty miles an hour if they are not caught at it, but it's here as a great vehicle in the modern social scheme, and the manufacturer is for anything and everything to protect human life and property within reason.

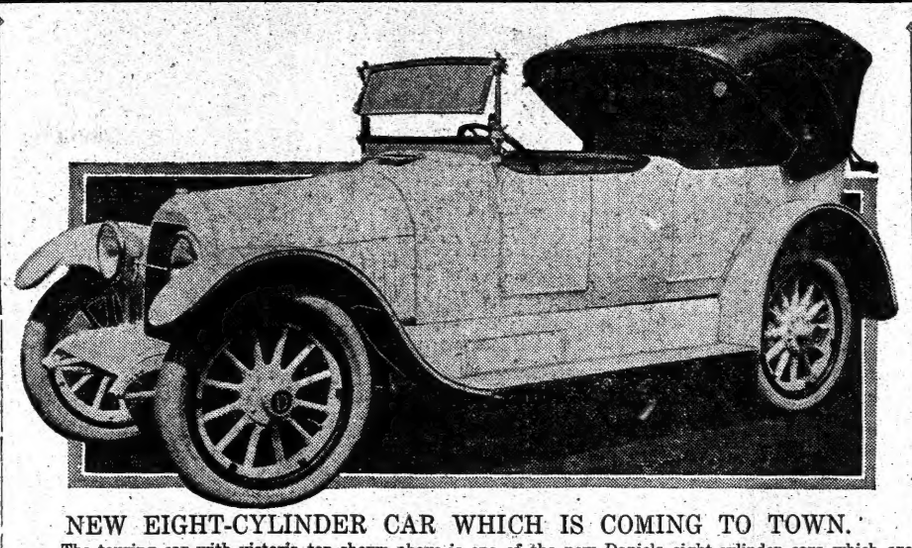
The manufacturers will put on any sort of attachment. They won't put a $500 fender on a $500 car. That wouldn't be reasonable. They will do anything within reason—not because they are forced to do it—but because they are ordinary human beings. As a unit the automobile manufacturers are against the unlawful use of the streets. They are against cut-outs and all that sort of thing. This 'safety first' movement is very young, so let us go back into the automobile history and we will find why there is a notion on the part of some people today that the manufacturer is for speed. Some of the first men who sold cars were ex-race drivers, some liverymen, some hackmen, they were not experienced merchants; cars jumped from fifteen miles an hour up to fifty and sixty and seventy miles an hour and racing was one of the chief sports.

"The while industry has been judged by the class of men who first went into it. These men were not necessarily business men, but were able to drive a car at twenty miles an hour and not get caught. The tremendous growth, the great volume of business that is shown, all of these things have tended to put the automobile industry in the lime light and keep it there.

"But we are for the regulation of traffic; we are for safety first, last and all the time. This thing calls for education and not legislation, it calls for co-operation and not coercion. I agree with the gentleman who says that we ought to have a law under which every man who drives a car ought to be examined. The automobile is a dangerous thing in the hands of a man who does not know how to use it. If you want such a law, we are with you. All we want you to do is to sit down with us and go over these provisions. We are here to say we will co-operate in any way. Let us get at it in a way of education. For instance at my factory—it's off in the northeast part of the city—there are workmen's dwellings all around. The children run probably fifteen to the family. There were thousands of children all over the streets and sometimes they would come out and fling themselves out to see if we could dodge them. We decided we would try to get rid of them.

"I could see the increased insurance insurance rate coming, and put that first if you will. Don't give us credit for the first count on a humanitarian basis. The next thing, however, was a humanitarian proposition. We could get these children away if we did it in the right way. We had a vacant lot about the size of this convention floor. We got in touch with the Play Ground Commission and fixed the grounds up as a playground and kept the children there. We had a wading pool, swings and everything that a playground would have and those children are off the streets. 'Safety first'—that meant saving of dollars to us and saving of lives to these children.

"We want the accidents stopped. We don't want cars sold to people who cannot drive them; we are for some reasonable form of license and I want to again assure you we are with you."



NEW EIGHT-CYLINDER CAR WHICH IS COMING TO TOWN.

The touring car with victoria top shown above is one of the new Daniels eight-cylinder cars which are to be handled in this city by the A. Elliott Ranney Company. Limousine, coupé, and brougham, as well as touring and roadster models, will be on view shortly at its offices. The models of this American-made car have been accepted for exhibition at the next Importers' Automobile Salon.

SELF-STARTERS NEED SOME CARE

Their Troubles Mainly Are from Neglect, Says Brokaw of West Side Y. M. C. A.

The development of the self-starting device and its general adoption by auto makers and drivers have brought a new source of trouble to garage and repair men. A self-starter that will not start either itself or car is a vexation, and the coming of the short days with cool mornings has produced many. Of course the greater part is due to misuse, carelessness or ignorance, and a lot of drivers are learning how to start their self-starters when they will not start themselves.

Some of the trouble, it is true, is due to the fact that many thousands of the earlier types of the self-starter have been in use long enough to need repair parts and a general overhauling, but so much has come from simple "don't know" that the automobile school at the West Side Y. M. C. A. of New York City has put in a course on "self-starters," which is being patronized by garage and repair men, as well as individual drivers.

"The self-starter is responsible for a lot of other troubles," said H. C. Brokaw, Director of the school, last week. "For instance, a car may be running along smoothly when the lights flash up and then go out. 'Mr. I Don't Know' starts in at the generator or the battery to trace each wire to locate the trouble. The trouble was that the lights had burned out. There was a loose connection at the battery, or between the battery and generator, and the entire current generated was sent over the light circuit, which quickly burned out the lamp filaments. 'Mr. Know It' looks for the loose wire, puts in new bulbs, and goes on without fear of the traffic cop.

"You see cars running every night with only part of the lights in order. Some have one headlight, some none, and others have not even the tail-light. The average owner knows mighty little about his car and its mechanism. He listens to the salesman of a self-starter and lighting system or of the car having it and absorbs just enough of it to rise up later and trouble him.

"Many think the storage battery, for instance, is big enough to stand up under any conditions. They do a lot of starting and little running—which is when the battery is charged—and they do their running all at night, when all the lighting circuit is drawing upon the battery, and then wonder why the battery falls down. The conditions noted prevent the generator from recharging, and sooner or later there is a discharged battery.

"Troubles of self-starter systems, which suggest the remedy needed, may be summed up as: First, neglect of ordinary care—it isn't kept clear; second, short circuit or open circuit; and lastly, worn, broken, or burned-out parts, which would be discovered by a general overhauling at intervals."

AUTO ROWDIES PUNISHED.

Drunken Chauffeur Held for Grand Jury and Bottle Thrower Jailed.

On a Sunday several weeks ago a party from Orange, N. J., while motoring through the outskirts of Goshen, N. Y., noticed another car coming down the road at an excessive speed and swaying from side to side. It was later proved that all the occupants of the car were intoxicated. One of the passengers hurled an empty bottle which splintered the windshield of the first car and painfully injured the driver.

The prosecution of the guilty parties has been vigorous. The man who threw the bottle was sentenced to six months in the County Jail and the other passengers were fined for disorderly conduct. The complaint against the driver of the offending car, operating an automobile while under the influence of liquor, came up for a hearing last Saturday, which resulted in his being held under bail to await the action of the Grand Jury. Several representatives of the Automobile Club of America attended the session.

New Signs for Lincoln Highway.

The Automobile Club of Philadelphia has provided funds and issued instructions for the erection of special Lincoln Highway signs at each corner on the Lincoln Highway in the city. Work is now under way under the sanction of the Philadelphia Department of Public Works.

Entries Pouring in for Auto Shows.

That the magnitude of the two great National Automobile Shows at New York and Chicago will be in keeping with the present motor car boom is evidenced by the constantly increasing number of space reservations being made. The number of makers of motor cars and accessories who were on hand to draw for spaces early this month at the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce made it certain that previous shows would be beaten. The demand for exhibition space, however, still continues. Since the drawing, S. A. Miles, who manages the shows for the Chamber of Commerce, has made allotment of 157 more spaces to exhibitors.

What The Paige Jubilee Means

These, you know, are Jubilee days.

Paige men, all over the country, are celebrating two great events—the first anniversary of the Paige "Six-46" and the completion of the mammoth new addition to the Paige factory.

All summer we have been eagerly waiting for this factory addition to be finished.

All last spring and all this summer we have been obliged to refuse orders because there were not enough Paige cars to even partially supply the demand.

But now we have arrived.

The new buildings, the new machinery and a great army of men have given us a capacity of 150 Paige Sixes each day.

Now—for the first time in twelve long months—we are prepared to take your order and deliver the car on the same day.

So, come in and help out with the Jubilee celebration. Come and see the two great Paige cars which have been at a premium ever since they were first introduced to the American public.

There is no obligation to buy. This is our "Party," and we want you to accept the invitation in just that spirit.

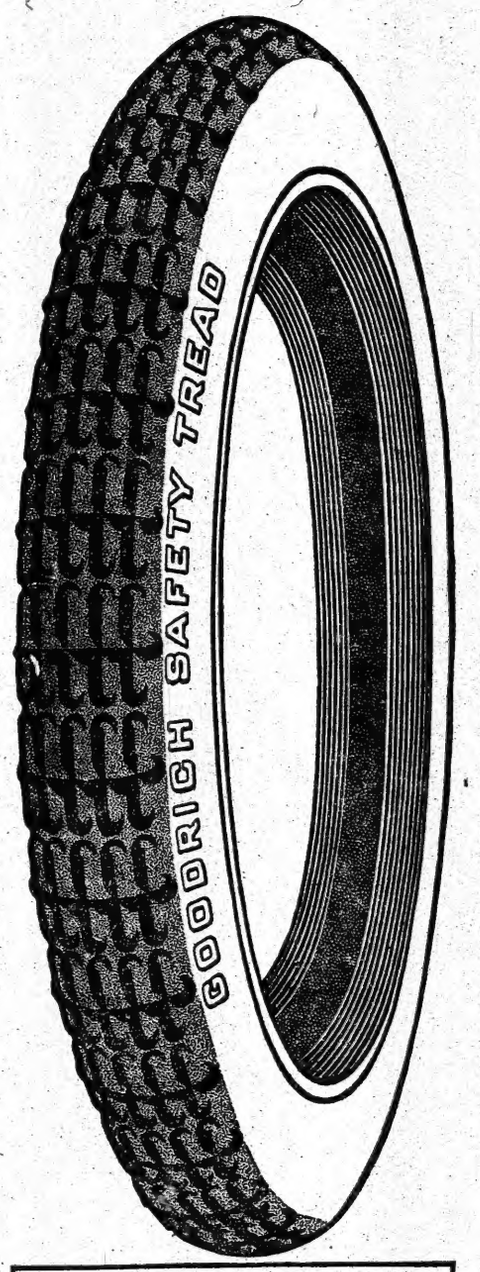
The "Barefoot" Tire——
——and Why.



WHEN you take your Shoes off tonight, do this:
—Bear your weight on your right Foot and, without lifting it off the floor, press it forward and backward firmly.

Then observe that only the bony and muscular Structure of your Foot moves forward and backward, while its Sole stays fixed on the floor.

That demonstrates the rolling motion of flesh and muscle, the elastic Cushion quality which reduces friction in walking, and prevents slipping (backward, forward, or sideways).

It supplies that CLING quality, which gives Traction without Friction.

It protects the Bones and Sinews of the Foot against the Wear and Tear of action, as a lubricant protects Metal moving parts, while providing the wonderful "Barefoot" hold on slippery surfaces.

CONSIDER now the means by which Tires have been given maximum Traction,—i. e., by means of a "sandpapery" texture in the Rubber of their Anti-Skid Treads.

Assuredly such Tires do give Traction.

But, every time the Brakes are put on, to make such Tires grip the road, the relatively hard, unyielding, and comparatively brittle, texture of the Rubber in their Treads causes these Treads to grind away on the pavement, to WEAR OUT fast at the point of contact.

The sudden efficiency of their grinding-Traction also tugs so sharply on the Rubber Adhesive between the layers of Fabric in Tire as to separate these layers.

There is little "give" to them—just as there is little "slide" to them.

So, they gain Traction at the expense of Mileage.

Naturally such Tires require a great BULK of such Rubber in order to deliver reasonable Mileage before worn out.

And, therein they differ radically from GOODRICH "Barefoot" Tires.

Because,—
—The Safety-Tread on Goodrich Tires is made of a very unusual, secret, and exclusive Compound, which we will here call "Hyper-Rubber."

It is much lighter, in weight, than the Rubber used in other makes of Tires, being free from the "sandpapery" ingredients that are heaviest and inert.

Observe, that every pound saved on the weight of Tires (or any part of a Car below the Springs) is equal to a saving of 30 pounds when supported above the Springs (ask your Engineer).

Its lightness, however, is secondary to its STRETCH, its enormous STRENGTH and Longevity.

AND here is how it acts in Automobiling,—
—When the weight of the Car bears on this clinging "Hyper-Rubber" Tread, and the power is applied to go ahead or reverse, the stretch in the Sole (or Tread) of the Goodrich Tire acts as a sort of Lubricant between the Fabric Structure of the Tire and the Road.

Then the Hyper-Rubber "Toes", of the Goodrich Safety-Tread Tire, CLING to the pavement (instead of grinding against it), just as your Bare Foot would cling to a slippery surface—without Grind, and so, with the minimum of Frictional Heat or Wear for maximum Traction.

Goodrich "Hyper-Rubber" is made into Goodrich Motor Cycle, and Bicycle, Tires, as well as into Goodrich Rubber Boots, Over-Shoes, Soles and Heels.

You will know them by their stylish

INTERESTING HAPPENINGS IN MOTORDOM DURING THE WEEK

AMERICAN AUTO EXPORTS DOUBLED IN LAST YEAR

Aggregated $74,000,000 for Fiscal Year, and May Go to $120,000,000 for Calendar Period—Complete Table Shows Details.

American automobile manufacturers, according to figures announced last week, doubled their sales abroad last year, their exports of automobiles and parts thereof in the year ended June 30, 1915, having aggregated more than $74,000,000, against $38,000,000 in 1914, $2,000,000 in 1904, and $1,000,000 in 1902, the first year of record. The gains were most pronounced in the second half of the fiscal year, and if the record made by July is maintained until the end of December, which seems probable from present indications, the total exports of automobiles in the calendar year 1915 will be well above $120,000,000.

All parts of the world are buying American motor trucks and passenger automobiles, about eighty different countries being represented in the year's sales. Our motor trucks are being sold largely in England, France, and Russia. In Greece, Denmark, Sweden, and Serbia sales have also reached unparalleled proportions. Increased sales are likewise being made in many countries far removed from the war zone, including Canada, Cuba, Central America, Java, Australia, British South Africa, and in our own Territories of Hawaii, Porto Rico, and Alaska.

The year's exports of passenger automobiles were slightly less than those of 1914. Large gains in exports to the United Kingdom, Asiatic Russia, Cuba, Central America, the British West Indies, British Guiana, Venezuela, and British East Africa were more than offset by numerous decreases occurring elsewhere, notably France, Germany, and various countries in Europe, South America, and Asia.

The constituent factors in the automobile export trade for the last two fiscal years are as follows:

Kinds.	1914.	1915.
Commercial automobiles	$1,181,611	$39,140,682
Passenger automobiles	25,392,963	21,111,953
Automobile tires	3,505,267	4,963,270
Automobile engines	1,391,893	1,4 5, 3
Automobile parts	6,624,232	7,853,18
Total exports to foreign countries	$38,095,966	$74,476,422
Total to Alaska	8,435	91,38
Total to Hawaii	1,285,258	1,514,58
Total to Porto Rico	686,906	775,87

A complete record of the United States export trade in automobiles is contained in the table, prepared by the Department of Commerce, which follows. It shows the number of automobiles of each class exported to the different countries in the fiscal years 1914 and 1915 and the value of the exports in the latter year:

Exported to—	Commercial Automobiles. Number. 1914.	Number. 1915.	Value. 1915.	Passenger Automobiles. Number. 1914.	Number. 1915.	Value. 1915.	Auto Parts. Value. 1914.	Value. 1915.

SUPPORT OF MOTORISTS URGED FOR CONSTITUTION

Committee for Adoption of New Law Points Out Provisions for Road Building and New Highway Control.

Some reasons why, in its opinion, automobilists should support the new Constitution have been brought forward in a statement issued last week by the Committee for the Adoption of the Constitution, with headquarters in Albany. The statement says:

"There are several very good reasons why the proposed Constitution should have the support of all automobilists and all others who are interested in the development of good roads in New York State. Because automobilists have taken the lead in the good roads movement is a good reason why they should take an affirmative part in bringing about the adoption of the revised Constitution.

"One of the first arguments in the new Constitution that will strike one as deserving of support by automobilists is the provision for a great Department of Public Works as one of the constitutional departments of the State Government. Heretofore the highway development in the State has been intrusted to a department that rested on a statutory basis only. Under the proposed Constitution, the Commissioner of Public Works will be one of the constitutional officers composing the Governor's cabinet of advisers. He will have under his direction the development of the State highways, hitherto intrusted to the Commissioner of Highways. The good roads movement in New York State has suffered in the past from politics. It has suffered from a lack of continuity, so far as policy is concerned.

"Within the last six or eight years this policy has shifted a half dozen times. It has never been possible to tell when a new administration came into power whether the Highway Department was to be left unchanged or whether its control was to be transferred into new hands. The new Constitution, if adopted, will go a long way toward assuring continuity and stability in the State's good roads policy.

"There are two other very good reasons why automobilists should support this Constitution. In the first place, the new Constitution will give the Department of Highways the right, which has hitherto been withheld, of building a State road through the heart of the Adirondacks. The present Constitution prevents any trees being cut in the forest preserve for any reason whatever. This has been an effectual stop to the construction of State highways through the preserve. The road which the amendment will authorize will run from Old Forge, by way of Raquette Lake, Blue Mountain Lake and Long Lake to Saranac Lake. It will be the only highway laid out directly through the mountains from east to west. The road is almost entirely over State land. When constructed it will be one of the finest scenic roads in the country, and will complete the connecting system of roads throughout the Adirondack State Park.

A second reason why this proposed Constitution should be looked on with favor, particularly by automobilists, is that its adoption will authorize the expenditure of about $2,500,000, raised under the second highway bond issue, for the use of the State, which would otherwise revert to the sinking funds of the State. The restrictions on this bond issue provided for the arbitrary apportionment of the moneys to counties with the provision that the amount so apportioned could be used only in the county to which it was assigned, and only for State roads provided for in that county under the original plans for highway development.

"The result of this apportionment was to create a surplus of the sums to be expended in some counties and a deficit in others. The proposed amendment will allow the surplus to be applied outside of the limits of the particular counties so that a large number of important links in our State highway system can be built. There are more than 250 miles of connecting links on important highway trunk lines that can be built if this amendment to the Constitution is passed. These reasons ought to appeal to all those who are seeking to find in the new Constitution provisions which are clearly an improvement over the present one."

CONVICT ROAD WORK PAST EXPERIMENT

Dr. Whitin Believes It Has Come to Stay—Methods Important.

"The use of convicts on the public roads has passed through the period of hysterical wrangle into a period of actually successful accomplishment and almost universal acceptation," said E. Stagg Whitin, whose new course in practical penal problems at Columbia University was announced the other day.

Dr. Whitin holds that the underlying motive in convict road building must be to secure the greatest efficiency for the State out of its possessions. Both the convicts and the roads are property of the State, and the working of convicts upon the roads should eliminate many elements of waste in the administration of road and prison departments.

"The efficiency of the convict on the road gang," he continued, "differs greatly in different gangs. There is no doubt in my mind that the application of the efficiency records in use at the present time in the Wisconsin road camps for free labor will tend even more perceptibly to raise the efficiency of convict labor.

"Incentive must be created before good work can be produced. Coop any of us up in a stuffy, insanitary jail for several months, arraign us for trial amid the excitement of what we misname as justice, and then take a few months of breaking our spirit in prison surroundings, and there is little likelihood that the thing we call ginger will be very apparent. The great need is for the foreman of a convict road gang to throw his shoulder to the task and inspire his gang with the desire to be like him. The problem lies in securing such men as foremen of the road gangs."

The graduate department of highway engineering at Columbia University has been in close touch with the National Committee on Prisons and Prison Labor, which is located on the campus, for a number of years. Thesis work has been carried on under the joint direction of the department and the Prison Committee.

A VOTERS' DIRECTORY PREPARED BY THE CITIZENS' UNION

Information About Each Candidate for Assembly and Board of Aldermen.

MANY GET AN INDORSEMENT

All Were Asked to Give Views on Suggested Legislation—County Candidates Listed Also.

The Citizens' Union has prepared a directory of all candidates to be voted for in New York City at the coming election. Special attention is paid to candidates for the Assembly and the Board of Aldermen.

"The adoption of the new Constitution," the report states, "will make the next Legislature important, and will also give greatly increased power to the Board of Aldermen."

The Union says that it has been able to indorse more Democratic candidates this year than ever before—some because of their record in office, and others because of their recognized ability.

"Speaking generally," says the report, "the character of the aldermanic candidates is higher than it has ever been before. The Citizens' Union states that there is an exceptional opportunity by discriminating voting to elect a Board of Aldermen, not only with a strong Fusion majority but also with some competent men in the minority who will consider public questions on their merits and whose services would be of distinct value in the Board. It has indorsed men of that type and urges their support by the voters, regardless of party affiliation."

In order to obtain their views the Union submitted a list of seven important subjects of legislation to each Assembly candidate. These included civil service examination for election officers; simplification of primary nomination regulations; more power to cities to control municipal elections; restricting legislative control over charter amendments submitted by cities; a smaller Board of Education for this city, and New York City control of county officers.
